CATALOGUE OF WORKS AND INTRODUCTION TO HIS ART

Patricia Ann Todd

This is a catalogue of works by the Canadian artist James D. Duncan (1806-1881). Included are all his known oil paintings, watercolours, drawings, book and magazine illustrations and prints. For each work the following information is given: title, date, medium, measurements, collection, inscriptions and literature. This is followed by a description of the work with explanatory notes on the subject when thought pertinent. An introductory essay is included. This serves to inform the reader on the nature of Duncan's artistic activities and to place him in relation to his milieu.

This essay serves as an introduction to the art of James D. Duncan (1806-1881) accompanying the Catalogue of his work. Duncan was born in Northern Ireland and immigrated to Canada in ca. 1825. From 1830 until his death, he lived in Montreal; establishing himself in that city as a professional painter and teacher of drawing. There is little extant information concerning Duncan's life. It is the authors' intent to provide as detailed a biographical outline on Duncan as possible and to discuss his artistic activities and stylistic traits. In addition, Duncan's career will be dealt with in relation to the economic, social and artistic environment of nineteenth-century Montreal.

Duncan's artistic career is very much a reflection of his milieu, one in which numerous changes were taking place in all aspects of the western world in general and the Canadian scene in particular. He reflected in his lifetime changes in social, political and intellectual thought. This is mirrored in his paintings which focus in subject matter on the Montreal scene. The city experienced unprecedented growth and prosperity in the second and third decades of the nineteenth century. During this period, the city was flourishing economically with a new intensity never previously experienced. There was growing trade with the export of timber, grains and other natural resources in exchange for imported manufactured goods. Local entrepreneurs pioneered in Canadian banking, particularly the founders of the Bank of Montreal in 1817. This pioneer spirit is also reflected in canal construction with the Lachine Canal opening in 1826 and in railway building with the Champlain and St. Lawrence Railroad, the country's first railway, opening in 1836. The ready circulation of money had an advantageous effect on education. The Royal Institute for the Advancement of Learning was established in 1818 and the Royal Grammar School (1818-1843) achieved a credible reputation. McGill College secured a royal charter from William IV on March 31, 1821 and was officially opened in 1829.

1. This increased the long standing rivalry between Montreal and Quebec City, the latter, however, retaining its position as the administrative centre. In 1828, an editorial in the Montreal Gazette aptly summed up Montrealers' view that "Quebec affords an example of centralization of Military, Civil, Financial, Clerical, Commercial and Marine power, worthy of the policy of the late Napoleon Bonaparte". Montreal Gazette, 10 Nov. 1828.

The progress during this period in the areas of education was largely confined to English institutions relying on private endowments. French Canadian education had suffered seriously from the Conquest and the Papal suppression of the Jesuits in 1773. For the French population, education was still closely linked with religion and therefore under the control of the Church. The English on the other hand, felt that education was more a secular matter which should be placed under the supervision of the state. Public instruction therefore, made slow progress in Montreal largely due to the lack of co-operation between the two linguistic groups. The 1840's were more active for French Canadian education. In 1842, the Jesuits returned to Lower Canada as a teaching order and in 1844, the Institut Canadien was founded. The latter organization was important in introducing to Montreal the influence of liberal anti-clerical views of nineteenth century France.

C.f. Donald CREIGHTON, Dominion of the North, Toronto:1962, pp. 215-16.
By contrast, in the Political sphere, strife and turmoil surrounded Duncan. The situation was widespread throughout the province; the difficulties were felt most keenly in Montreal where French, English relationships became increasingly bitter. Lord Dalhousie (1770-1838) held the office of Governor from 1820 to 1828; he was a Scot and Presbyterian whose pronounced suspicions of Roman Catholics were reflected in his bad handling of the Assembly. Louis-Joseph Papineau (1786-1871) was the most dynamic figure of the opposing group, serving as speaker of the Assembly from 1815 to 1837. He wielded great influence and under his leadership, many members of the Lower Canadian Assembly felt that certain American institutions offered a more satisfactory form of government. He affirmed that:

...the constitution and form of government which would best suit this colony are not to be sought solely in the analogies offered by the institutions of Great Britain.

The constant antagonism between the Governor and Council and the Assembly accelerated during the mid-1830's, reaching an inevitable climax with the brief but bitter Rebellion of 1837. During this uprising, Duncan served as a Lieutenant in the Light Infantry.

4. CREIGHTON, p. 236
The political unrest of the period unfortunately coincided with an increasing influx of English speaking immigrants. Widespread economic depression, unemployment and general discontent particularly in Scotland, Ireland and England, forced thousands to seek a new life in Canada. Upper Canada was the intended destination of the majority, but Quebec City and Montreal, as the main ports of entry, carried heavy burdens. Most ocean-going vessels docked at Quebec City with their passengers ascending the river on barges towed by steamboats. Between 1815 and 1825, some fifty thousand persons arrived; many of these were seriously ill resulting from their arduous journey.

Montreal lacked facilities to cope with the large numbers. In 1815, a number of Montreal women banded together to form the Female Benevolent Society of Montreal to supply food and maintain a 'House of Recovery' for the most needy immigrants. The Montreal General Hospital was completed in 1822. In spite of efforts like these, the problems resulting from the enormous numbers of immigrants grew steadily worse; this forced the Legislature of Lower Canada to lodge an official complaint with the British Colonial Office in 1827. 6

6. JENKINS, pp. 274-75.

The protest was not directed at the immigrants themselves, but rather at the manner in which the British Government evaded its responsibilities.
The majority of the new colonists went to Upper Canada; many Irish, however, remained in Montreal finding jobs in the construction of the St. Lawrence canals. The growing economy offered opportunity for individuals outside the labouring sector. Duncan began to paint in Montreal in 1830.

Montreal was transformed by the increased population. There was expansion in the suburbs which was accompanied by a redrawing of the social and economic boundaries in the inner city. The population grew from a mere 19,090 in 1820 to 27,297 in 1830 and by 1840 totaled 40,465 persons, a doubling in just two decades.

The face of the city was altering rapidly. Duncan records these changing aspects. The St. Lawrence River and Montreal Harbour which he pictured, reflected the new prosperity and growth. Sailing vessels and canoes of earlier years mingled with an ever increasing number of timber rafts, barges and new steamboats. The Molson and Torrance lines competed for the river's new traffic. Large new warehouses were constructed at Pointe à Callière in 1826 and at 8. The population figures vary according to different sources. The most complete study is: Jean-Paul BERNARD, Paul-André LINTEAU, and Jean-Claude ROBERT, "la croissance démographique et spatiale de Montréal dans le 1er quart du 19e siècle". Tableau 1, p. 17, Groupe de Recherche sur la Société Montréalaise au 19e siècle, Rapport et Travaux, 1973-75, Département d'histoire, Université de Québec à Montréal.

approximately that date along Commissioners and St. Paul Streets. An increasing number of shops, banks, offices and institutional buildings were built in the downtown area. Notre Dame and St. Paul Streets became important commercial centres. The steep-roofed fieldstone architectural tradition, which had previously characterized Montreal, was replaced by cut limestone and greystone. This was introduced first to Montreal by the United Empire Loyalists from the United States and later by the English, Scottish and Irish immigrants. The revival architectural styles of Europe began to appear in Montreal. In 1824, James O'Donnell designed the new parish church of Notre Dame in the 'gothic' revival style, which upon completion in 1829, dominated the Montreal skyline until the 1880's when larger office buildings began to be built. The classical revival style was introduced in 1838 with the construction of John Ostell's Customs House on Place Royale.

10. Ibid, p. 917.
11. The earliest example of the 'classical' revival style in Montreal is not actually represented by a building but by a monument. Nelson's Column, designed by the London architect Robert Mitchell was erected in 1809. It was built in the 'classical' style in part because it was a properly symbolic monument of its epoch, but also as a symbol of the British Empire; as an expression of British solidity, permanence and strength.
The year 1830 has therefore been termed a "watershed for building in Montreal". 12

James Duncan established himself in Montreal as a professional painter and teacher of drawing. He pictured Montreal life and scenery in oils, watercolours and gouaches. These document the changing social and physical aspects of the city and achieve for him a niche as recorder par excellence of mid-nineteenth century Montreal.

Duncan was born in 1806 in Coleraine, Northern Ireland. His native city is located on the Bann River in the County of Londonderry, ten kilometres from the port of Portrush on the North Atlantic Coast; it was a small commercial centre during the early nineteenth century. Little is known of Duncan's life in Ireland. 13 Possibly he received 12, LAMBERT, p. 518.

13. A search for information concerning Duncan's life and activities while in Ireland has revealed nothing. All local parish records and legal documents in Northern Ireland were deposited in the central Archives in Belfast (during the early 1900's). These were destroyed in a series of fires of the 1920's and 30's. The most reliable source concerning Duncan's birthdate and family are the records of the Scotch Presbyterian Church, St. Gabriel Street, Montreal, of which Duncan was a member from 1834 to 1881. See: CAMPBELL.
some art training in Europe but no documentary evidence has been found. However, he did paint in Ireland; in 1825, he arrived in Canada bringing with him a large oil painting, Giant's Causeway. 14

The reasons for Duncan emigrating are speculative. Was it due to the severe economic conditions, unemployment or general discontent at home? Presumably the nineteen year old youth must have landed at Quebec City, later journeying down the St. Lawrence to Montreal. His first known Canadian painting is Montreal From the Mountain (Cat. 1a 1) but it is uncertain where he spent his first five years in Canada. 15

14. CAMPBELL, p. 630.
The Giant's Causeway is a rock formation located on the North Atlantic Coast of Northern Ireland, just west of Portrush. Duncan's painting Giant's Causeway was exhibited at the Society of Canadian Artists (Montreal) exhibition of 1868. He also exhibited at the same time a number of other Northern Irish views, namely, View of Dunluce Castle (East), County Antrim, Ireland; View in Ireland, Castle of Sir A. Doherty, Isle of Dogs, Donegal; Dunrobin Castle, Seat of the Duke of Sutherland; View of Ballintoy, Ireland, and Dunluce Castle. It is not known if these works were painted in Ireland or after Duncan arrived in Canada.

15. Duncan is not listed in any of the Quebec City or Montreal Directories between 1825 to 1830, nor is he mentioned in local newspapers.
In 1830 Duncan became a citizen of Montreal living thereafter in that city. He made periodic trips to Quebec City and environs, and visited areas of Upper Canada in both 1848-49 and 1868. Montreal was both an obvious and opportune choice. While a large number of Irish immigrants had already settled there, Duncan's decision, however, was more logically based upon his career aspirations. When he entered the Canadian art scene, Quebec City was experiencing what has been called a "Golden Age" in painting.

There were active, well established artists namely, Jean-Baptiste Roy-Audy (c1785-1845) and Joseph Legaré (1795-1855). The latter's pupil, Antoine Flamond (c1804-1895) had just returned from France (1830) and during the next two decades would become one of Quebec's most celebrated portraitists. These artists dominated the Quebec City patronage and provided Duncan with little artistic or intellectual compatibility.

16. CAMPBELL, p. 630.

17. Mary ALLODI, Canadian Watercolours and Drawings in the Royal Ontario Museum, The Royal Ontario Museum: 1974, no. 685. There is no firm documentation of Duncan's visits to Quebec City and environs. He produced views of these areas throughout the early and middle portions of his artistic career, i.e: La porte du chien d'or à Québec ca. 1831 (Cat. 11 c 2); Montmorency Falls From the Levis Shore ca. 1848 (Cat. 11 d 20) and Views of Quebec, ca. 1850 (Cat. IV 9-15).

Montreal, on the other hand, had dominated the Canadian art scene during the 1790's. By the 1830's, a void was developing with the demise of such major artistic figures in that city as William Berczy, (d. 1813) and later Louis-Joseph DuLongpré (1754-1843). A number of lesser known artists, John Drake (1794-1883) being one, had worked in Montreal briefly. By the 1830's, this void in Montreal offered a more open 'market' for a young career-minded painter than did Quebec City. There was as well, by this time in Montreal, an established, middle class, who were potential patrons. The businessmen, merchants and professionals were beginning to develop an interest in paintings, watercolours and prints which mirrored their city's new prosperity. Duncan was prepared to cater to this Victorian bourgeois demand.

Indeed, a private patron, may well have lured Duncan to Montreal. Immediately after his arrival in 1830, he began to execute commissions for Jacques Viger (1787-1850). During the 1830's and 40's, Viger continued to provide the artist with employment, assuring him of at least minimal support.

19. Duncan executed drawings and watercolours for three separate Viger projects, namely, Viger Album (Cats. II a 1-26), L'Album des Costumes des Communautés Religieuses de Femmes au Canada en 1853 (Cat. II a 27), and Ma Saberdache (Cats. II a 28-32). See Introduction Section 11 Watercolours and Drawings a) Viger Albums in the catalogue for details.
Duncan married Caroline Benedict Power of Sorel, Quebec in 1834 and she shortly gave birth to the first of their five children. Duncan must have found it difficult to provide for himself and his growing family solely on income from Viger's commissions. He embarked

The names, dates and occupations of Duncan's children (when known) are as follows:

James Shaw Duncan, graduated from McGill School of Medicine in 1858 (cf. McGill University Graduate Archives), he thereafter became a surgeon in the 81st Regiment of the British Army and later Brigade Surgeon at Plymouth (cf. CAMPBELL, p. 631).

George Duncan, Surgeon in the British Army, later had a practice at Portsmouth (cf. CAMPBELL p. 631).

David Logan Duncan, born in 1852 in Montreal, was employed in the Customs House, Montreal (cf. CAMPBELL, p. 631), and died in March, 1898 and is buried at Mount Royal Cemetery, Outremont, Que. (cf. Archives of the Mount Royal Cemetery).

Caroline Duncan, born in 1845 in Montreal, died on Oct. 9, 1863 at the age of eighteen, buried at Mount Royal Cemetery, Outremont, Que. (cf. Archives of Mount Royal Cemetery).

upon a wide range of activities in the mid 1830's which brought added income and enlarged his scope of artistic endeavors. During the next fifty years, he taught drawing at various Montreal schools, produced photographic, miniature and oil portraits, prepared illustrations for a guide book and magazines, and was an active lithographic draughtsman. Throughout, he also painted a number of landscapes in oil and was a prolific watercolourist.

In teaching, Duncan achieved a reputation as a 'conscientious and accomplished instructor'. Commencing in 1842, he is listed in the Montreal directories as a "Teacher of Drawing". In 1845, an advertisement appeared in La Minerve announcing that Duncan and M.G.H. Gordon, were opening a drawing school, which offered:

21. CAMPBELL, p. 630.
...aux amateurs de cet Art des moyens de l'étudier, égaux à ceux qu'on trouve dans les grandes villes d'Europe, et pour remplir ce but, rien ne sera épargné pour fournir à l'institution, de temps à autre, les modèles et les études tirées des principaux Dépôts Artistiques de l'Europe.

The school was scheduled to open in November in "La Salle Suseuse" over Mr. Lyman's Pharmacy on Place D'Armes. The "ladies" classes were to be held on Monday and Wednesday afternoons from four to six; the "gentlemens" on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons at the same times. The School never appears to have materialized; there may not have been the demand for such classes.

Duncan did, however, find steady employment as a teacher in a number of Protestant schools which opened in Montreal. During the 1850's and 60's, he was a part-time instructor of drawing at the McKay Institute, the Young Ladies Academy of Misses Turner and MacIntosh, The British and American School of LaGauchetier Street, The High School of the McGill Normal School and the Montreal High School. Some students recall having Duncan as their instructor.

but reveal little concerning the conduct of his classes. 25

25. A letter dated April 7, 1921, written by a certain Dr. Sheperd recalls that Duncan was "...a teacher of Drawing when I was at the High School of McGill College in the 60's...", National Gallery of Canada Library, File no. 02.2, Montreal Spr. File.
More than a dozen portraits have been located which were painted by Duncan prior to the late 1850's. Among these, is a three quarter length oil painting, numerous miniatures in watercolour and pastel, and a few silhouettes. Duncan's miniatures are uneven and inconsistent. Few works are attributed to him; this may result from his failure to develop a recognizable style. Examples of his finest portraits are found in a series of historical Canadian likenesses commissioned by Jacques Viger between 1839 and 1845. Principally, these are miniatures of circular format in watercolour, pen and ink. The majority of the subjects were men and women long dead and Duncan was often compelled to copy earlier paintings.

The artists' main objective was to provide a reasonable likeness. The facial features are carefully drawn in the two bust portraits of Madame de la Peltrie (Cat. Ila 18) and Mère de l'Incarnation (Cat. Ila 19). In some miniatures, Duncan introduces anecdotal material relating to the sitter; Mgr. de Saint Vallier (Cat. Ila 21) is seated in an ornate gilt arm chair holding a Bible, hanging on a wall is a small oval portrait of Louis XIV, the then reigning French Monarch.
Duncan provides texture and modelling in some works through stipple brushwork. In Père Emmanuel Crespel (Cat. 11a 13), the facial features isolate themselves from the "surround" by reason of the stippling, which contrasts it to flat generalized treatment of the body and the neutral background. The formula is reversed in Mgr. Jean-Jacques Lartigue (Cat. 11a 17), where pronounced stippling in gradations of greys and browns in the background successfully creates a sense of pictorial depth.

The managing of proportions and spatial rendering is awkwardly handled in Duncan's half and three-quarter length portraits. Typical, is the half length portrait of Père Louis Soumande de Saint Augustin (Cat. 11a 14), the figure is placed well forward in the picture plane and seated in a chair partially visible to the right. The arms are disproportionately long in relation to the body and uncomfortably placed. The vertically rigid pose combined with the angling of the chair results in a spatially incoherent image.

If Duncan's rendering of these miniatures is at times awkward and unconvincing, his reputation as a portraitist is saved by his larger and more freely painted heads. In the watercolours of Père Joseph-François Lafitau (Cat. 11a 24) and Portrait of Vattemare (Cat. 11a 22, Fig. 1), he frees himself from the strict circular format of the miniatures and explores the arrangement of forms within a rectangular framework. As a result, the figures have a greater sense of movement and a three-dimensional quality. Duncan's brushstroke is much looser resulting in a spontaneity which contrasts with the more laboured appearance of the miniatures.

Because it was executed from life, Duncan achieves in Portrait of Vattemare a sense of intimacy which is lacking in many of his other portraits. He catches a degree of personality through the detailed but soft delineation of the eyes, nose and tightly pierced mouth, and the subtle modelling of the cheeks and forehead. The careful rendering of the facial details is in contrast to, an emphasised by the wispy treatment of the hair and generalized brushstrokes of the bust area.

Few portraits painted by Duncan in the 1850's are known, and by 1860, he appears to have stopped painting likenesses. Probably, Duncan was also a photographer; on November 1, 1856, the following

No photographs which can be definitely linked to Duncan have been found.
Duncan's limited production of portraits during the 1850's may result from his numerous other activities. During this decade, he was painting an increasing number of landscape views and genre scenes of Montreal. The majority of these are watercolours, but he also painted a few oil landscapes.

Only three major landscapes in oil by Duncan have been traced; possibly a direct result of lack of patronage and demand. Montreal From The Mountain (Cat. 1a 1, Fig. 11), dating from ca. 1826, is probably his first major work painted in Canada. Stylistically, this early painting strongly reflects his acquaintance with those idealized landscapes which originate in the Italianate tradition of the XVII Century. Was Duncan familiar through prints with the works of Nicolas Poussin, Gaspar Dughet and Claude Lorrain? In this work, he established a formal approach to the scene and underlying scheme of composition which remains constant in his oil landscapes. Note, that within the foreground, he provides formal variety through placing a flock of sheep and shepherd boy in an open meadow. Shadow extends across the first plane; this is broken by a ray of sunshine which dramatically highlights the flock of sheep. In the dark middleground, are open fields with small farm houses and clumps of trees and bushes. Beyond, the city of Montreal is in full light. The buildings are treated in a generalized manner, but Duncan permits identification of important buildings such as the Parish Church dating back to 1677 and Christ Church of 1810. The distant St. Lawrence River and south shore are in muted greys offset by the pale pink and yellow sunset sky. Pronounced planar composition, dramatic contrasts in light and shadow and overall careful arrangement of the natural scenery creates an idealized view.

This classical idealism found in Duncan's early oil landscape, gives way to a more descriptive approach in Montreal From The Mountain and Montreal From St. Helen's Island (Cat. 1a 2, Fig. 111), both painted in 1838. His principal objective has shifted to recording the most flourishing aspects of Montreal. In Montreal From St. Helen's Island, the St. Lawrence River in the middleground, is dotted with sailing vessels, barges and steamboats. The buildings of the Montreal harbour and cityscape beyond, are now shown in striking detail with each structure clearly discernable. It is curious to note, that in his desire to present the 'best' view of the city, Duncan includes the towers of Notre Dame, though they were not actually built until 1841 and 1843. Mount Royal in the background looms as a hazy backdrop to the city in contrast to the subtle blues, pinks and pale yellow of the sunset sky. The scene is framed in the right foreground with tall, delicately foliated trees, at the base of which are anecdotal figures; on the left is a large dead fallen tree. Some areas of the foreground are slightly shadowed, but Duncan no longer employs dramatic contrasts in light and dark. Enveloping light clarifies equally all parts of the view.

A lively sales market developed in Montreal for watercolour landscapes and genre paintings during the mid-nineteenth century. Duncan catered to this market and much of his oeuvre falls into this category. Duncan's watercolour landscapes were attuned to a vogue for illustrative views of familiar scenes. The attitude towards the land was still influenced to a great extent by eighteenth century concepts, whereby, the world was seen to be governed by mathematical laws and logic. An attempt to impress this attitude on the Canadian physical environment, which was regarded as the 'uncontrollable foe', was still very evident. The overall tendency was to bestow on the Canadian scenery a sense of order and decorum. Duncan's choice of landscape views and his handling of the subjects, represent this approach. In his works, he shows aspects of the scenes which best illustrate the city's or localities' prosperity, and carefully records the technical and physical advancements as well as the domination of the land by man. In this context, his work is conceptual for he impresses a logical order on the Canadian environment. 29

28 Duncan also painted some landscape views of areas around Québec, i.e.: Montmorency Falls From the Levis Shore ca. 1848, Cat. 11d 20); Baie Saint-Paul ca. 1845 (Cat. 11d 37); and Upper Canada i.e: View of the Thames at London, Ontario, 1848 (Cat. 11d 21), and General View of Niagara Falls From the Canadian Shore, ca. 1848 (Cat. 11d 23).

Little is known of Duncan's artistic training and one merely speculates on the sources of his watercolour style. Possibly, he became aware of the British watercolour tradition in Ireland. He could have had the opportunity of seeing works of Paul Sandby, Alexander Cozens and John Sell Cotman. This same school first made its influence felt in Canada in the works of the British military officers posted here between ca. 1760 and 1840.

29. The ideas of 'truth to nature' and 'naturalism' were being expressed in the works of some other Canadian artists. Harlow White (1817-1888), Daniel Fowler (1810-1894), and William Nicol Cresswell (1822-1888) basically were motivated by a searching for these qualities. At the same time, Cornelius Krieghoff (1815-1872), was expressing a more romantic approach to picture making through dramatic colouring and lighting. Duncan supresses both the naturalistic and romantic approach in his work.
Duncan could have seen lithographs of works by George Heriot (1766-1844) and James Cockburn (1778-1847). His counterpart, Kriehoff, was influenced by prints after William Bartlett (1809-1854) and Coke Smyth (d. 1867) sketches.

Fundamentally, Duncan is a conservative artist. He is no philosopher but absorbed instinctively contemporary styles and aesthetic trends. One may isolate aspects of his watercolour style of the 1830's and early 1840's in a number of views of Montreal and its environs painted for Jacques Viger between 1831 and 1845. The rendering in Ruines of the Old Fort of Sault St. Louis, Caughnawaga (Cat. 11a 6, Fig. IV), is purely topographical; Duncan's attention centers on the correct reproducing of the fort and its surroundings. This approach is in contrast to Village de Ste. Genevieve, Ile de Montreal (Cat. 11 a 2) where the church in the middleground is treated in a highly detailed manner. Note, that in the latter, Duncan gives equal attention to the arrangement of a large framing tree, bushes, a stream and anecdotal figures in the foreground. In Vue de la Cote des Tanneries des Rolland, Oct. 1839 (Cat. 11a 1) and others, he combines effectively the demand for topographical accuracy, as demonstrated by current taste, with a certain idealism.

By the 1840's, Duncan establishes a style which remains constant in his later watercolour landscapes. This is best exemplified by his numerous 'Views of Montreal From the Mountain'. In View of Montreal From the Mountain ca. 1840 (Cat. 11d 3), the pictorial convention and schematization is consistent with his earlier oil landscapes Montreal From the Mountain and Montreal From St. Helen's Island (see pages 23-24). He carefully renders foreground foliage through the application of alternating pure greens and yellows superimposed over pale green and brown washes. This colour scheme is highlighted by the dark blue, brown and red clothing of a mother and child included on the right. The Montreal cityscape in the middle-ground, is highly detailed with the brown and grey structures clearly delineated by dark outlines. Beyond, the horizon line is silhouetted by the undulating profiles of Monts St. Bruno and St. Hilaire. Duncan's watercolour landscapes, beginning in the 1840's, are characterized by the careful ordering of the scenes, planar composition, detailed rendering of architecture and vegetation, inclusion of anecdotal figures and overall even lighting.

From the mid-eighteen forties, some views demonstrate an interest in autumn colouring. The panorama of Montreal in Montreal From the Eastern Slopes of Mount Royal (ca. 1862 (Cat. 11d 49), is still particularized and detailed, but much of the artists' attention is riveted on the autumn landscape in the foreground. His subtle handling of the foliage is in pale yellows, roses and pinks over light green washes. A soft mid-afternoon light establishes a total atmospheric unity. This subdued representation of autumn colouring is apparent in the majority of Duncan's watercolours of the 1860's and 70's. One notes it in Schneider's Inn, Como, Quebec, ca. 1868 (Cat. 11d 53, Fig. V) and Green Avenue in Westmount, Looking Towards the Mountain, 1872 (Cat. 11d 55). There are exceptions, in occasional works, he attempts to mirror the more vibrant and colourful range of Canadian foliage. The deciduous trees in A Waterfall ca. 1859 (Cat. 11d 48) and Autumn Landscape ca. 1875 (Cat. 11d 56), are painted in rich reds, oranges and yellows, contrasting with the dark greens of the firs. A crisp blue sky with white fluffy clouds completes the autumn atmosphere.

Throughout his career, Duncan painted watercolour genre scenes. These picture ordinary people in everyday life situations; a type of painting for which there was much contemporary demand in Canada.
as evidenced by the popularity of Kriehoff's genre works. Duncan's genre scenes, as opposed to those of Kriehoff's, centered mainly on city subjects. One distinguishes a genre interest first in Duncan's earliest known sketchbook dated 1840-45 (Cats. 11b 1-36). These portray the Montreal harbour and streets in both summer and winter. He focuses on a wide range of subjects whether they be market scenes (Cats. 11b 5-7, 12, 17, 26-7), sleigh scenes, (Cats. 11b 4, 8, 22, 28, 31), ice cutting and snow removal (Cats. 11b 2, 18), local parades (Cats. 11b 23-24), a wedding (Cat. 11b 14) or the activities of the well-dressed upper class. There are also a number of scenes of local Indians (Cats. 11b 34-35). These sketches were intended as preliminary studies for use in later compositions. Some are detailed pencil drawings as in Celebrated Blind Fiddler, Montreal (Cat. 11b 23) whereas in St. Patrick's Society Parade (Cat. 11b 23), Duncan felt it necessary to complete a more finished watercolour.

In these genre works, Duncan reveals a natural power of simplification and observation. His portrayal is more objective than that of more "personal" artists such as Kriehoff who painted Duncan's main concern is to provide detailed and accurate accounts of the scenes or activities. Even when dealing with Swell and His Object (Cat. 11b 31) or Indian Kid (Cat. 11b 34), there is little, if any, social or moral comment. Scene in Market (The Painter Shows His Work, Montreal Market) (Cat. 11b 26), is a sole exception to this deliberate objectivity. Here, amidst the busy Montreal market, Duncan depicts a middle-aged artist showing his work to the crowd. Duncan was probably familiar with such scenes and this picture may have autobiographical overtones.

One notes specific examples of the relationship between Duncan's sketches and his later developed watercolours. The rendering of the Indian in the right foreground of the deliberately composed View of the River Front in Winter, Montreal (Cat. 11d 41), is identical to that which appears in Indian Kid (Cat. 11b 34) of his 1840-45 sketchbook. Additive subject matter in the same painting also finds its source in Water Carriers (Cat. 11b 30) and Carting Ice From River (Cat. 11b 19) of the same sketchbook.

31. HARPER, Cornelius Krieghoff - The Habitant Farm, p. 10
Duncan employs the same approach in many genre and landscape paintings. Note the careful composition, planar recession and detailed depictions of forms in many of his genre subjects. For example, groups of adults toboganning down a hill occupy the foreground of A View Near Montreal, Toboganning by Moonlight ca. 1856 (Cat. 11d 41, Fig. VI). The artist deliberately frames his vista with tall, elongated trees on either side. In the middleground is a thick forest and beyond, a lake or river. He adds such elements as a full moon, dark clouds and reflected light. These should transform the scene into a dramatic or romantic whole. The very detailed rendering, the quality of precision and lack of pronounced shadow or any suggestion of emotion however, remove the work from any romantic categorization.

In genre of specific city subjects, Duncan provides detailed portrayals of both local activities and surrounding architecture. The Quebec Tandem Club, Champ de Mars, Montreal ca. 1850 (Cat 11d 28 Fig. VII) pictures a typical winter weekend amusement of wealthy Montrealers. Set against a detailed panoramic view of Montreal looking west is the "Quebec Tandem Club" assembled in the Champ de Mars. Here the members display their elegant two-seater and four-seater sleighs led by teams of spirited thoroughbreds. 32

32. Many of the sleighs and styles of dress of the occupants find their source in Duncan's 1840-45 sketchbook ie: Swell and His Object (Cat. 11b 31) and in his 1847 sketchbook, ie: Horse and Buggy (Cat. 11b 40) and Winter Street Scene, Montreal (Montreal Swells) (Cat. 11b 50).
Duncan renders these sleighs in great detail and also the fashionable, brightly coloured attire of the 'swells' with precision. Two large houses facing onto the Champ de Mars are drawn with great attention paid to architectural details.

Duncan paints a number of historical subjects in the eighteen forties and fifties. Some are recreations, others are of contemporary events. Jacques Viger stipulated the inclusion of historical scenes for Ma Saberdache. Within Ville Marie en 1693, prior to 1858, (Cat. 1la 32), Duncan pictures the infant settlement as it would have appeared at that early date. Each landmark is labelled because the work was to be a visual record accompanying Viger's collection of historical documents. Duncan carefully places and reproduces the structures for this reason. First Encounter with the Illinois ca. 1845 (Cat. 1la 30, Fig. VIII) and similar subjects are imaginary scenes. A missionary with a cross and a French explorer approach four Indians who proffer pipes. Beyond, Indian groups in their camp-ground, watch what was to become an historical event.

33. Ma Saberdache, located in the Archives du Seminaire de Quebec, is Viger's collection of historical Canadian documents. Between 1839 and 1858, Duncan provided Viger with watercolour illustrations to accompany these documents. See Catalogue 11 a Viger Albums for details.

Turn to Duncan's tableaux of contemporary events. On July 9, 1852 a fire broke out in the buildings surrounding Montreal's Dalhousie Square. Duncan records this event in an oil painting The Hayes House Fire (Cat. 1a 6). He focuses attention on the Hayes House, formally the site of the Royal Theatre. The house in the centre of the composition, is engulfed by flames. Groups of men and women are rescuing their belongings from the surrounding buildings, carrying them to the open safety of Dalhousie Square.

To heighten the drama, Duncan chose the black of night. Large yellow and orange flames escaping from windows and roofs illuminate the dark structures. They cast an awesome glare over the frantic fire-fighters. The grey sky above is filled with clouds of thick black smoke.

35. Thanks to M. Raymond Montpetit, Directeur, Module Histoire de l'Art, Directeur, Groupe de Recherche en Art Populaire, Université de Québec à Montréal for information concerning the Royal Theatre.
Duncan painted the Funeral of General D'Urbain, Commander of the British Forces in Canada in 1847 (Cat. 11d 14). Here his approach is more sombre in colour and static in line as befits the solemnity of the occasion. But it is a detailed and accurate portrayal of the funeral procession as it moves eastward along Notre Dame Street. Lining the street, are British soldiers wearing parade dress and leaning on their swords, hilt downwards, out of respect for their dead commander. A military band leads the procession followed by the coffin on a gun carriage pulled by two teams of white horses with officer mounts. Crowds have gathered on the street and lean out of the windows of houses to watch the event. The only accents of bright colour are the dark red jackets of the soldiers and the red British flag which drapes the coffin.

Many Duncan watercolours of Montreal life and scenery were reproduced as line drawings for the Illustrated London News in the 1850's. Montreal Market, Habitants Purchasing Cloth (Cat. 111 4).
and Sawing and Ploughing the Ice on the St. Lawrence (Cat. 111 8). admirably compliment the written descriptions published in that periodical. Most are faithful copies of his original works; The Ice House on Nun's Island, Montreal (Cat. 111 9, Fig. IX), is based on the watercolour of the same title in his 1840-45 sketchbook (Cat. 11d 32).

Throughout his career, Duncan produced in addition, drawings and watercolours for use in other engravings and lithographs. The first of these were illustrations for Newton Bosworth's guide book, Hochelaga Depicta, published in 1839 and reprinted in 1846 (Cat. 111 1 Fig. X). These were engraved by a certain P. Christie and picture vistas and specific buildings of Montreal. The compositions are unimaginative, but Duncan provides great architectural detail and accuracy. The work is an invaluable historical record of Montreal in the late eighteen thirties.

Such accurate detail and attention to architecture is characteristic of Duncan's prints. His Panoramic View of Montreal, engraved by W.S. Barnard, was published in 1847. Duncan strives to picture to most flourishing view; the St. Lawrence River is dotted with numerous sailing vessels, barges and steamboats. Each structure of the Montreal Harbour and cityscape beyond, is clearly delineated. He reverses the the facade of Bonsecours Market (begun 1845) and slightly elongates the central dome to show its most impressive viewpoint. This concern for presenting prosperous aspects of the city is also evident in such later works as City of Montreal From the Mountain (Cat. IV 15). This view lithographed by Gauci in 1854, shows the newly constructed factories in the westend and the new railway dock to the east.

Six 'Views of Montreal' ca. 1849 (Cats. IV 3-8) are the finest examples of lithography by Duncan. He did the drawings on stone and they were published by Matthews of Montreal. Probably, Duncan chose to do lithography for its obvious commercial potentials; it also is an exceedingly faithful process of reproduction permitting the inclusion of half tones, subtleties which cannot readily be achieved through line engravings. These prints depict various Montreal views, Notre Dame Street (Cat. IV 4, Fig. XI), Steam Boat Wharf (Cat. IV 6 Fig. XII) and Montreal From the Indian Campground (Cat. IV 8 Fig. XIII). Though not remarkable as examples of lithography, they record for posterity a now vanished image of Montreal. The compositions and pictorial treatment is similar to that of Duncan's watercolours; Montreal From the Mountain (Cat. IV 3) is almost identical to View of Montreal From the Mountain (Cat. 11d 3, see page 27).
By the eighteen sixties, Duncan had achieved a measure of financial as well as artistic success. With such painters as Kriehoff and Martin Sommerville (act. 1839-56), he exhibited at the newly formed Montreal Society of Artists in 1847. He also exhibited at the Quebec Provincial Exhibitions of 1852 and 1863-65, at the Art Association of Montreal 1865-79, and at the Society of Canadian Artists from 1868-70. Duncan entered sixteen works in the first exhibition of the Society of Canadian Artists. Daniel Fowlers' annotations in the catalogue for this exhibition, note that Duncan sold works to the value of a hundred and seventy dollars, and that he was awarded an "Art Union Prize" of ninety dollars. Duncan's financial returns were far greater than those of such well known fellow exhibitors as William Cresswell (1822-1888), John Fraser (1838-1898), Henry Sandham (1842-1910), Adolphe Vogt (1842-1871) and indeed, of Fowler himself. 37

Increasingly, towards the end of his life, Duncan appears to have been involved in commercial undertakings. In 1864, he was connected with the profitable enterprise "Duncan & Co., Lithographic Printers, Engravers & Draughtsmen" located at no. 12 Great St. James Street. 38 He also completed a number of prints of Montreal and Quebec City in these later years (Cat. IV 22, 23). He does not cease painting during this period, but restricts his output of original works to highly finished watercolour views of Montreal and its environs (Cats. llid 55-58).

By the mid-eighteen seventies, Duncan's children were well established in their respective professions. His wife Caroline died in 1877. Two years later, Duncan travelled to England and Scotland, on the basis of surviving documents, supposedly to purchase works of art for the Montreal collector George Drummond. Upon his return to Canada in 1880, he was named an Associate of the Royal Canadian Academy, exhibiting at that institution at the second annual exhibition in 1881. He died on September 28, 1881 at the Montreal General Hospital and was buried the following day at Mount Royal Cemetery, Outremont, Quebec.

Duncan's career as an artist and teacher of drawing is typical of the activities of Montreal painters in the nineteenth century. His output in a variety of media was prolific and he maintained throughout, a good standard. Upon immigrating to this country, Duncan was already equipped with certain painting skills and acquainted with the style of idealized landscapes. That much of his paintings produced in Canada are illustrations and non-innovative, is curious. The question arises as to whether or not he was merely catering to an artistically unsophisticated and indifferent market, or, on being physically removed from European art circles, he must have felt the lack of intellectual or visual inspiration.

39. Letters and documents of the late George Drummond. In his correspondence with Drummond, Duncan suggested that the latter purchase works by such artists as Gustave Dore, Corot, F.A. Kaulbach and Piloty.

40. Archives of the Mount Royal Cemetery.
By the eighteen sixties, Duncan achieved in his watercolours, a discerning style of his own. These carefully composed works, reveal a keen perception of nature, and a consistent concern for the accurate portrayal of architecture and genre. The subdued and subtle handling of autumn foliage apparent in many of these, is particularly fine. His works remain today as invaluable historical records of the period. They also provide us with evidence of Duncan's comparative aesthetic powers.

p. 189, illus.

This painting was probably Duncan’s first major work in oil produced in Canada, and as such served as an advertisement of his artistic abilities.
The painting demonstrates a strong 18th Century
classicising tendency with the large panoramic, view carefully organized according to a preconceived notion.

The foreground meadows on Mount Royal are framed on the right by a group of trees and bushes with a herd of sheep on the left, and a shepherd boy and dog in the centre. The farms on the lower Mount Royal slopes with the emerging Montreal cityscape in the distance occupies the middle ground. In the background the river St. Lawrence is dotted with sailing vessels; Monts St. Bruno and St. Hilaire and surrounding plains are hazily depicted. The Montreal cityscape is dominated by the spires of the third Parish Church (begun 1672) and the Church of England’s Christ Church (1810). Duncan reveals an interest in truthful architectural rendering (later a pronounced stylistic trait).
The artist’s predominant colours are browns and dark greens. Highlights on the sheep in the foreground and Montreal buildings are handled with ochre and white. Cloud formations in the upper portion are rendered in soft yellows and whites
with slight traces of pink hues.

Pendant to MONTREAL IN 1838 (Cat. 1a) 3.),
the two works are Duncan's major oil landscapes.

The foreground is framed on the left by a group of shaded muddy red trees extending one third the height of the painting, and on the right by smaller sunlit trees and bushes with two children seated on a diagonal fence. In the centre foreground is a clump of yellow bushes to the right of which is a clearing occupied by a standing mother, her child and two seated gentlemen.
In the middleground are muddy green open field surrounding the McTavish House, beyond is an aerial view of the city of Montreal rendered in light greys with white and yellow highlighting.
Each structure is clearly discernable by reason of the artist's careful delineation. The city centre is dominated by the Anglican Cathedral's (designed 1805) spire and the towers of Notre Dame Church (begun 1823). Duncan has included the towers of the latter church despite the fact that they were not constructed until 1841 and 1843.
In the background the river St. Lawrence extends the width of the work behind which are Monts St.
Hilaire and Orford and surrounding plains. A subdued'pink sunset sky with wispy grey clouds occupies the upper portion of the work.

Montreal is pictured from St. Helen's Island which affords one of the best sightings of the harbour of Montreal. Duncan has accentuated the city's prosperity. A large fallen tree and bushes occupy the left foreground, to the right
a group of trees extends the height of the work and through which the viewer may perceive the eastern portion of the city. Groups of soldiers and women and children are located in the centre and right foreground with the bright red
of the soldiers uniforms contrasting the predominantly dark brown and green landscape. The St.
Lawrence River occupies the major portion of the middle ground, the artist has set down with care and deliberation sailing vessels, steamboats,
barges and rowboats which traverse the river.
The harbour and Montreal skyline are dominated by the Anglican Cathedral and Notre Dame (with twin towers). To the rear right Mount Royal looms as a greyish, hazy backdrop to the city, contrasting the blues, pinks and pale yellows
of the sky.

Jean-Jacques Lartigue (1771-1840) was born in Montreal and first studied for the law and later for the priesthood. In 1819 he joined the Sulpician order and represented the latter in a legal plea which took him to London, England. In 1820 he was appointed Montreal suffragan to the Bishop of Quebec and in 1836 became the first Bishop of Montreal.

This portrait is attributed to James Duncan on the grounds that it is almost identical in composition and colouring to the 1839 miniature portrait of the same subject in the Viger Album (see Cat II a.17) which is definitely by the artist. It has been presumed that the latter version is a copy by Duncan of his earlier portrait. Both works are from the collection of Jacques Viger but there is no other evidence to substantiate the Duncan attribution.

In comparing the two works stylistically, it becomes apparent that they are not by the same artist. The portrait in the Palais archiépiscopal depicts Mgr. Lartigue seated comfortably in a crimson arm chair, his body is slightly turned toward the viewer and with his right hand he marks the pages of a red and gold book (the Bible?) which rests on his lap. He is wearing the violet robes of his rank as Bishop, with a white silk and lace shirt underneath. A large gold cross,

1 b) 1. (continued) highlighted with white on the left hangs from a chain around his neck. The rectangular neutral brown background has been transformed by the artist into a painted oval which frames the subject. The copy by Duncan in the Viger Album is identical in composition and colouring to the above, but certain subtle differences make the two quite separate. The positioning of the figure in Duncan's work is awkward, the subject does not rest comfortably in the chair (in fact it is quite impossible considering the angle of the chair with that of Mgr. Lartigue's body for him to be sitting in it). The right arm is unnaturally elongated with the hand clumsily holding the book.

It is in the area of the face that the differences between the two works becomes critical. The earlier portrait (in the Palais archiépiscopal) shows Mgr. Lartigue gazing to the left, his inward slanting eyebrows are furrowed and his mouth is tightly shut, giving an overall serious frowning expression. The artist has depicted the facial skin in an ochre, pink and produces a plastic, three-dimensional effect. Duncan's miniature copy (Viger Album) has the same slant of the eyebrows but now the subject looks directly at the viewer and the expression becomes less intense with little if any psychological penetration. Although the face is somewhat three-dimensional the quality of the modelling is much less successful compared with the earlier work.

Probably the portrait in the Palais archiépiscopal, Montreal, is by an unidentified artist and that when Viger commissioned Duncan for his Album the latter copied the earlier work.¹

1. The first portrait was possibly in Viger's collection and he may have commissioned Duncan to copy it.

The majority of Duncan's portraits are in the watercolour medium:

Duncan's first major patron in Canada was Jacques Viger (1787-1858). Born and educated in Montreal, Viger became the first mayor of Montreal in 1832.¹ His interests however, were as much antiquarian as political. He befriended Duncan in the early eighteen-thirties and thereafter until his death provided the young artist with steady work. During this period Duncan produced numerous drawings and watercolours for Viger (see Cats. 11, c & d). Those included within this section of the catalogue are confined to works which comprise three separate and distinct commissions.

The first of Viger's projects on which Duncan worked is the Viger Album. (Montreal Municipal Library, Cats. 11 a 1-16). Duncan worked on this commission between the years 1831 and 1845, producing watercolours whose subject matter covers a wide range of Canadian material. Fourteen of these are a series of portraits of important Canadian historical personages. Most are miniatures, two are possibly taken from life, and the remainder copies or based on written descriptions.

Other works by Duncan in the Viger Album are views of historical sites in Montreal and the surrounding area, imaginary depictions of historical events, and studies of Canadian wildlife and vegetation.

In 1853 Duncan worked on a second project for Viger, the L'Album des Costumes des Communautés Religieuses de Femmes au Canada en 1853.

This album was presented to Mgr. Cajetan Bedini (1806-1864) who travelled to North America in 1853 to study the situation of Catholicism in the United States and Canada. Bedini was much impressed by the number and variety of Catholic institutions in Canada and

Bedini served as the Commissaire de l'Etat pontifical in Bologne between 1849 and 1852. In 1853 he was sent to Brazil and in the same year was requested by Pope Pius IX to make a study of the state of Catholicism in North America. While in Cincinnati he came into conflict with the defrocked Italian Alessandro Gavazzi whose violent declarations against Catholicism would later cause the 'Gavazzi Riot' in Montreal in June 1853 (Duncan depicted the event in watercolour form, see Cat. 11 d). After his two month visit to Canada, Bedini returned to New York and then to Brazil. Upon his return to Europe he was appointed Cardinal and Bishop of Viterbe.

while in Montreal Viger presented him with the above work as a souvenir of his visit. The location of the original album is unknown, however, Viger was so impressed by the quality of the work, and also being aware of the historical value of such a record to Canadians, that he commissioned Duncan to produce a copy (acquired by the Montreal Municipal Library in 1953, Cat. 11 a 27). The album consists of sixteen watercolours depicting the various female orders in Canada in 1853. Within each work Duncan provides a detailed rendition of the history of each institution (through inscriptions and visual portrayal), the manner of their dress, in many cases the structures which they occupy, and the nature of their vocations and services to the community i.e. care of the sick, orphans, education etc.

One of Viger's main delights was his collection of historical Canadian documents. This collection is located in the Archives du Séminaire de Québec and includes the manuscripts entitled Ma Saberdache.¹ The latter is a compilation of historical writings and records illustrated by drawings and watercolours, a number of which are by Duncan (Cats II a 28-32). In most cases the subject matter deals with visual descriptions of historical events as First Encounter With the Illinois (Cat. II a 30), or with historical scenes Montreal in 1693 (Cat. II a 37). Some picture contemporary buildings such as L'Hôpital Général de Montréal (Cat. II a 28).

Apparently Duncan provided watercolours for Ma Saberdache between 1839 and 1850 because of his acquaintance with Viger. Note also that there are numerous other works by Duncan from the Viger collection, now in the Archives du Séminaire de Québec, which seem to have been intended for the Ma Saberdache project. Studies such as Ancienne Citadelle de Montréal (Cat 11 c) and views such as Church of St. Timothée near Beauharnois (Cat 11 d) share with the works in Ma Saberdache a similarity in subject and handling which suggests that Viger had commissioned them to be included in Ma Saberdache.

In the centre foreground a wide dirt road slopes downward into the middleground with a large carriage with two teams of horses, two pedestrians and a small horse and buggy. The left and right foreground pictures trees and shrubs which are separated from the road by wooden fencing.
The foliage is rendered in varying shades of yellow and orange over green and brown washes.
An aerial view of the village of Saint-Henri appears in the centre-right middleground with the spires of the local Catholic church dominating the smaller houses and farms which cluster around it. Large green poplar trees contrast the pre-dominently grey/white houses and brown fields.
Hugely rendered in the distance is the St.

Left foreground three large trees extend the height of the work and form a framing arch over the central composition. Two small children sit on planks of discarded wood in the shade below.
The central sunlit middle ground is occupied by the grey, white houses of the village of Sainte-Genevieve, which are dominated by the white, centrally located church of Pierrefonds with its tall single spire. A flock of birds (Carada geese?) fly immediately above the cross. In the right middle ground is a small lake surrounded by pastel green and yellow trees and shrubs.

Duncan produced another view of the same subject entitled ST. GENEVIEVE, NEAR MONTREAL (location unknown) which was exhibited at the Montreal Society of Artists exhibition in 1847.2

Within this interior view of the Bishop's Church, Montreal (completed 1810) Duncan commemorates the consecration of the bell for the Sisters of Charity. The artist's vantage point of the entranceway provide a complete view of the interior. In the centre of the church the Bishop stands on a pulpit; surrounded by assistants and a large crowd. More onlookers occupy the second storey gallery in the upper left of the composition. Duncan has taken care in rendering the interior architectural and decorative details resulting in an historically important record of the structure.

This watercolour resembles a work (part of Jacques Viger's MA SABERDACHE.- Saininaire de Québec) by the artist John Drake (1794-1883) who in 1828 was commissioned by Viger to produce views of important structures in Montreal and the surrounding area. Possibly when Duncan accepted a similar commission three years later, Viger showed him Drake's view of Fort Senneville.

The vantage point for this scene is the shore opposite Fort Senneville. The composition is framed on the right by a large tree with small dark green bushes occupying the foreground. A large barge traverses the water in the right middleground with a smaller boat in the center. The centre middle and background is occupied by the peninsula upon which Fort Senneville is located. The fort (burnt in 1775) is rendered in a grey, white palette with the artist carefully recording the stone walls and chimneys which remain standing.

This topographical rendition of Ste. Helen's Island is probably Duncan's first portrayal of the scene, a subject which he would frequently depict.

In the foreground the St. Lawrence River is rendered in blue, grey washes. A sailing ship with three full masts and flying the British ensign is on the right with a large steamboat in the centre. Two small rowboats are dwarfed beside these formidable vessels.

Within the middle ground appears Ste. Helen's Island the central portion of which is cleared of trees and occupied by two buildings. The left and largest of these structures is probably that of the British Garrison and with a tall flag pole flying the British colours high above the tree line.

Guillaume Vignal (c1604-1661, a Sulpician priest, was first recorded in Canada as Chaplain to the Ursulines of Quebec. In August of 1661 he replaced Jacques Le Maistre (assassinated by the Iroquois in 1661) as bursar of the Seminary of Saint-Sulpice at Montreal. Being anxious to finish the seminary which was under construction he went on Oct. 25th 1661 with a group of workmen to the Ile-à-la-Pierre to gather timber. The group was attacked by Iroquois, Vignal was seriously wounded, and was taken prisoner with three others. The Iroquois subsequently murdered Vignal near Cap-de-la-Madeleine on Oct. 27, 1661. "After scalping him, they are said to have roasted and eaten his flesh."

At the same time he supports a wounded workman while another behind him fires a rifle at the attacking Iroquois to the left. while he points to two of his companions lying on the ground beside him with two Indians checking to see if they are alive. To the right of this group another Indian holding a tomahawk looks toward the remainder of Vignal's party who have escaped in a canoe. More Indians in the centre left middleground fruitlessly aim their rifles at the canoe which is safely out of range. In the distance on the opposite side of the St. Lawrence River is Duncan's rendering of the city of Montreal as it might have appeared in 1661. It is a tiny village surrounded by dense forests with Mount Royal looming above. The reason for Vignal's sacrifici-

This is possibly a self-portrait. All the other thirteen miniatures within the VIGER ALBUM picture historical figures identified by accompanying inscriptions (except Cats. 11 a 21 and 23 where the figures are clearly identifiable by the detailed rendering of their religious and secular garments). This portrait therefore is an exception in that it is in no way identified and also bears no apparent relation to the subjects of the two watercolours beneath it.
Stylistically the work may be considered a self-portrait. This portrait, though considerably smaller than the others in the VIGER ALBUM contains the greatest amount of psychological penetration and analysis. The candid seriousness and intensity of the subject's gaze as he looks directly at the viewer is a typical stylistic trait of the self-portrait (i.e. Jan Van Eyck Man in a Red Turban). This portrays a man in his late twenties or early thirties (Duncan was twenty-eight in 1839). Possibly this miniature is in fact, a self-portrait inserted by the artist as a form of signature of his contribution to Jacques Viger's ALBUM.

Marie Madeleine de Chauvigny de la Peltrie (1603-1671) was born in France and married the Chevalier de Gruel, Seigneur de la Peltrie who left her a widow at twenty-two. She decided to devote her life and wealth to good acts and in 1639 financed herself, Marie de l'Incarnation (see Cat 11 a 19) and two other-Ursulines' voyage to New France. In Quebec she cared for, and educated Indian children.

This portrait is one of two on a single page positioned upper centre (see Cat 11 a 19).

The miniature depicting the woman in black secular dress with large white collar is based on the portrait of Mme Peltrie in the Ursuline Convent in Quebec.

devote her life to the church leaving her son

Nicolas-Marie-Alexandre Vattemare (1796-1864)
was a French ventriloquist, philanthropist and promoter of cultural exchanges. He devised a system by which individuals and countries, exchanged books, works of art etc. and in 1839 travelled to the United States to promote this plan. A year later he was in Montreal and launched a proposal for an institute that would combine three principal Montreal societies, The Natural History society, the Mechanic's Institute and the Montreal Library, all under one roof.

a) VIGER ALBUMS

The city hall, post office and stock exchange were also to be included. The Montreal Board of Trade and the City Council approved the idea and the proposal seemed settled when Wattemare left on March 5, 1840 and as a result the institute never materialized.

This portrait is one of the few in the Viger Album which Duncan probably painted from life. The choice on Viger's part of having Wattemares' likeness included in a largely historical album reflects the importance and impact which the latters' proposed institute had on the Montreal community at that time. It is also reinforced by the fact that Wattemare's host while staying in Montreal was Denis Benjamin Viger (1774-1861), Jacques Viger's cousin.

Duncan's portrayal of the subject shares with the possible self-portrait (Cat 11 a 12, 1) a freshness and sense of psychological penetration lacking in the other works. The bust portrait depicts a middle aged man with black thinning hair wearing a deep brown gentleman's jacket and tie with a white shirt. The rendering of the facial areas is detailed with the intense gaze of the eyes as they directly confront the viewer giving the impression of an intelligent and dynamic personality.

In 1844 the young intellectuals of Montreal set up the Institut Canadien based largely on Wattemare's institute.

Pierre-Francois-Xavier de Charlevoix (1682-1761) entered the Society of Jesus in Paris in 1698 and in 1705 was sent to New France to teach at the Jesuit College in Quebec. By 1713 he was back in Paris to further his studies and was ordained a priest. Between 1720 and 1722 he was sent to North America to investigate the rumors of a western sea;
his search led him as far as the mouth of the Mississippi. Charlevoix is important to Canadian history. He was the author among other publications of Vie de la mere Marie de l'Incarneration...(1724) and Histoire et description generale de la Nouvelle France...
(1744). He also served as the procurator in Paris of the Jesuit missions in New France
and Louisiana between 1742 and 1749.

Duncan's depiction of Pere Charlevoix is a bust portrait of a white bearded bald man looking to the left and wearing the black Jesuit priest's garments. The detailed portrayal of the face suggests that it is a copy.
Possibly that of Pere Charlevoix at Caugh-navaga). The artist has rendered the ochre, pink facial skin in fine hatching strokes
which he has also utilized in the brown background to give texture.

Joseph-Francois Lafitau (1681-1746) joined the Jesuits in 1696 and later became an ordained priest. In 1712 he arrived in New France where he served as a missionary among the Iroquois at Sault-Saint-Louis (Caughnawaga) for six years. During this time he became exceptionally fluent in the Iroquois tongue and discovered the ginseng plant in North America. Upon his return to France in 1717 he published Mémoire..., concernant la précieuse plante du gin-sang...(1717) and later Moeurs des sauvages américains...
(1722-24). He was appointed the procurator in Paris of the Jesuit Missions in New France
in 1722.

Duncan's portrait is probably based on one now
at Caughnawaga. Bust portrait of the subject

Jean-Baptiste Le Moyne de Bienville (1680-1767) was born in Montreal and in 1692 began his naval service which took him to France. In 1698 he led an expedition from France in search of the mouth of the Mississippi which he found the following year. Between 1701 and 1725 Bienville served as commandant at Fort de Mississippi and was a leader in colonizing Louisiana. In 1718 he founded New Orleans and held the position of Governor of Louisiana from 1733-1743. He returned to France in 1743 and spent the remaining years of his life in retirement in Paris. 1

Duncan's portrait is probably a copy. The work depicts Bienville wearing French naval armour and a neat white wig. The half-portrait shows the subject pointing with his right hand to the right of the work.

Beyond this group in the middle-ground are more nuns watching over children and talking with disabled persons. A large three-storied grey-stone structure with steeple and cross forms a backdrop to the composition. Duncan has provided a detailed rendition of the type of clothing worn by the grey nuns (founded by Marie-Marguerite d'Youville in 1758; see Cat 11 a 20) with their long grey under garments covered on the upper portion by a black tunic. They also wear a simple silver cross and black and white cap.

HOPITAL-GRÉAL DE QUÉBEC

The Hôpital-Général of Quebec was founded in 1692 by the Brothers Hospitallers of the Cross and of St. Joseph; in 1747 its direction was handed over to Mme d'Youville. Duncan's watercolour portrays the interior of the Hôtel-Dieu with a nun dressed in white with a large silver cross and black and white long head cape is speaking to a woman wearing shawl and blue dress. Beside the woman is a man with a red tuque and coat accompanied by a dog. To the left the artist shows a second room occupied by a nun and five young girls wearing the grey nun's novitiate dress.

Duncan depicts the Hôpital-Général in Montreal (founded in 1692 by the Brothers Hospitaliers of the Cross and of St. Joseph; in 1747 direction of the institution was given over to Mere d'Youville and the Grey Nuns). In the foreground on a dirt road (St. Paul Street) are two nuns, a horse and wagon loaded with barrels, and a family group. THE SIGMUND SAMUEL COLLECTION SKETCHBOOK (Cat. 11 b 1 - 36)

There are two extant Duncan sketchbooks. That presently in the Sigmund Samuel Collection, Royal Ontario Museum, Toronto is probably the earliest. The thirty-six, now separate pages which comprise this sketchbook were originally bound together in a jacket of red leather. Several sheets have J. Whatman watermarks with the dates 1831 and 1834. On the basis of stylistic analysis however, and the fact that the fashions depicted in many of the scenes (notably Cat. 15, 16 and 31) portray a mode of dress popular during the years 1840-45, it is probable that the sketchbook dates from this period.

The pages of the sketchbook are in good condition with little fading of colour or buckling of the paper. Each sheet has been numbered

This sketch portrays a typical genre market scene in Montreal during the 1840's. Duncan has carefully portrayed the serious expressions on the faces of the two standing and two crouching men in the centre foreground as they barter over rolls of tobacco. Hazily depicted in the background are two figures to the left and a horse and wagon to the right.

The same subject is repeated in the later 'Reford' sketchbook (Cat. 11 b 42 ). With this scene Duncan provides a visual reminder of the type of 'wagons' used during the mid-nineteenth century to transport large planks of wood through the narrow Montreal streets. The wagon depicted to the right of the work, is drawn by two teams of horses and moves away from the viewer towards buildings hazily depicted in the centre background. The 'wagon' itself has a set of small wheels in the front with a considerably larger set at the rear.

In the middle of the room the bride and groom dance to the music of a fiddler seated with friends at a table to the far right. Groups of happy onlookers form a circle around the dancing couple. Duncan's intent in producing this sketch and the one immediately following (Cat. 11 b 16) was to portray the type of clothing fashionable during the winter months in Montreal. The styles depicted in fact help to date the works in that they portray those popular during the years 1840-1845.

The composition is similar in both versions with either three wealthy men or women occupying the centre foreground, a sleigh and/or single figure in the background. The artist has taken great care in reproducing the types of hats, and garments worn by each sex.

THE 'REFORM' SKETCHBOOK (CAT. 11 37 - 66)

Duncan's second sketchbook is usually termed the 'Reform' Sketchbook after R.W. Reform of Montreal who owned the work until it was sold on May 28, 1968 at the Sotheby (Canada) Auction to a private collector.

The thirty-one pages which comprise the work are bound together in a jacket of brown leather. Several pages bear the J. Whatman watermark with the date 1843, but since three of the works are signed and dated 1847 it is the latter date which is assigned the work.

The title page of the sketchbook bears the inscription "James Duncan / Artist / Champs de Mars Street, Montreal".

The pencil and watercolour sketches depict genre scenes of Montreal many of which are subjects which appeared in the earlier Sigmund Samuel Collection sketchbook.

The original drawing is now part of the Viger manuscripts in the Archives de Séminaire de Québec. It is probable that Viger desired another copy of the above subject but since the structure was no longer extant he requested Duncan to reproduce Drake's version. The drawing portrays the front facade of the third parish church on Place d'Armes which was constructed in 1722 and demolished in 1830 when the new Notre Dame was completed. The tower on the left of the facade was left standing until 1843.

The drawing was probably commissioned by Jacques Viger for inclusion in his collection of historical manuscripts. It is possible that it was intended to accompany two historical watercolour views of Montreal by Duncan entitled Ville Marie en 1693 (Cat. 11 a 32) and Ancienne Citadelle de Montreal (Cat. 11 d 7) part of the Viger papers now in the Archives du Séminaire de Québec. A watercolour sketch of Cote des Neiges road from the mouth. In the right foreground is a horse and rider with a standing man and two young boys. To the right of this genre group are two trees which extend the height of the work, their foliage is rendered in broad yellow and green brush strokes. A dirt road (Cote-des-Neiges) extends from the centre foreground into the centre middle-ground; on the right of which are depicted small stone houses and a centrally placed church with single steeple. Lining the left side of the road is a tall wooden fence beyond which may be seen the roof of a large double chimney house. The outlines of the forms are rendered in a loose, broad manner with areas of grey wash for some of the houses with others left blank. The background trees of Mount Royal are depicted by a pale, thin green wash with the upper portion of the work untreated.
THE CHATEAU VAUDREUIL

ca. 1831.
w.c. pen and ink over pencil, 4 3/4 x 7.

Coll.: ASQ.
Prov.: Jacques Viger; ASQ.

This belongs with the Viger manuscripts in the Archives du Séminaire de Québec, and it is believed that the work was originally commissioned by Viger to be included in the Viger Album (see Cat. 11 a 1-26).
The work depicts the Château Vaudreuil which was renovated for Philippe de Rigaud, Marquis de Vaudreuil by Chaussegros de Léry (1682-1756) one of the most important architects working in New France during the eighteenth century. The Château was destroyed in 1803; the above rendering is therefore either a copy or based on written descriptions.
In the centre foreground standing on a dirt road are two men and a dog. The Château occupies the centre and right middleground with trees and a stone wall on the left. The building is a four storied structure of cut stone with a Canadian slate roof. A central rectangular section is banked at either end by wings. A central doorway with classical detailing is located on the second floor connected to the ground level by two semi-circular stairways. Large rectangular windows are located on the second and third stories with small dormers on the roof.

"Chaussegros de Léry was the first architect to use the newly found Canadian slate which obviously cut the expense of importing slate from France."

This work is Duncan's first watercolour view of Montreal From the Mountain, a subject which the artist repeated frequently throughout his career, (he had already painted two oil views in 1826 and 1838, see Cats. 1 a, 1 b & 2). The foreground slopes of Mount Royal are covered with yellow, green grass with large framing trees to the right. The Montreal cityscapes in the middleground is clearly outlined with Notre Dame (begun 1825) still dominated by the remaining spire of the old Parish Church, which was finally demolished in 1843. To the right is Christ Church (completed in 1810). In the background is the St. Lawrence River and the south shore.

ASQ.
Jacques Viger, ASQ.
I.r. margin "Duncan pint./Chateau Ramezay".

Probably commissioned by Viger to be included in his collection of historical manuscripts. The view depicts the house of Claude de Ramezay (1659-1725), governor of Montreal and New France from 1714-1716. In 1705 Ramezay purchased land on Notre Dame Street in Montreal and hired Pierre Couturier, a master mason and architect to build him a house which would be "unquestionably the most beautiful in Canada". The house was completed in 1706 and proved to be such an extravagant undertaking that Ramezay was forced to borrow 3,400 livres from the Franciscans to pay his builder.

Duncan depicts the Chateau as it appeared in 1845, largely unchanged since its conception. The building is of cut stone, three storeys high (including the attic with dormers) and has four large chimney stacks. Nine large rectangular windows and a classically styled doorway with pediment occupy the ground floor. Two trees and an iron fence separate the structure from Notre Dame Street with genre figures in the foreground.

Jacques Viger (1787-1858) was Duncan's first important patron in Canada (see Viger Album Cat 11 a) and it is possible that he commissioned the artist to paint his likeness.

The portrait depicts a heavy set standing three quarter figure wearing a black jacket and vest with black neck tie and white shirt. Hanging from a pale crimson ribbon around his neck is a medal, (a symbol of his rank as Mayor of Montreal). The rendering of the face is quite remarkable providing a good deal of psychological penetration. The figure gazes to the left of the work with the wrinkles and puffiness around his eyes suggesting him to be in his late fifties. His long straight nose casts a shadow over the left portion of his thin downward slanting lips. Traces of grey are evident in his brown hair which is combed from the back forward to cover a balding hairline. The detailed and in most instances unflattering portrayal however, gives an overall impression of a forceful yet warm and genuine personality.

Duncan renders the funeral procession of General d'Urbain as it proceeds eastward along Notre Dame Street. Lining either side of the street are British soldiers, in parade dress with bright red jackets, and leaning on their rifles or swords which are placed hilt downward out of respect for their dead commander. The procession itself is led by a marching military band behind which the coffin, placed on a wagon and covered with the British flag, is pulled by two teams of white horses mounted by British officers. Crowds of men, women and children have gathered on the street, and lean out of windows of the houses to watch the procession.

The buildings are rendered with great architectural care with those on the north side highlighted by a soft yellow mid-day sun. The structure on the immediate left bears the inscription 'MORRIS, SADDLER', and in the centre background the eastern tower of Notre Dame (1841) is visible.

In this watercolour Duncan has rendered a typical winter weekend amusement for the wealthy class in Montreal. In the foreground is the parade ground at Champ de Mars,
lined on either side by single rows of tall,
brown poplar trees. Here, the 'Quebec Tandem Club' has assembled to display their elegant two-seater and four-seater sleighs led by single and double teams of spirited thoroughbreds. The male and female occupants of the sleighs are fashionably dressed with brown fur rugs draped over the sleighs for both warmth and show. Spectators have gathered on the left to watch the display with two dogs chasing the horses in the centre. The snow is rendered in a greyish blue palette
providing a neutral background to the brightly coloured scene (i.e: sleigh in the centre is crimson blue with that on the far right being bright red).

In the left middleground are two large town houses facing onto Champ de Mars, the soft winter light casts a yellow glow over their facades. The centre and right background is occupied by the Montreal cityscape looking west. The tall spire of St. Patrick's Church on Cote Street visible on the right, and St. Andrew's Church on the left. To the right of these is the Jesuit College which stands as an imposing structure amongst smaller houses. Mount Royal, covered with trees, is rendered in a bluish-green palette to the far right. The sky which occupies the upper half of the work is a soft blue with grey, yellow and pink washes creating a typical mid-winter afternoon atmosphere.

*The dating of this work is ca. 1850 despite the inscription on the verso. There are two reasons to substantiate this. Firstly, the style of the sleighs and the fashions of dress worn by the figures in the foreground are similar to those depicted by Duncan in his second sketchbook which dates from 1847 (see in particular Cats. 11 b 40, 50-52) as opposed to those rendered in his earlier 1840-45 sketchbook (ie: Cats. 11 b 15-16,31). The second reason is based on the fact that the Montreal cityscape depicted by Duncan in the centre and right background of the work clearly shows a number of structure which were not built in 1840, ie: St. Patrick's Church (designed by P.L. Morin) was built in 1847. The cityscape which Duncan depicts is in fact identical to that rendered by E. Whitefield in his 1852 print entitled Montreal - Canada East (Coll. CdeR).

THE GAVAZZI RIOTS

1853.
W.c. over pencil, 9 1/8 x 14 1/2.
ASQ.

The work is unsigned but on the basis of the rendering of the genre figures, and the treatment of the architecture it may be attributed to Duncan.

In June of 1853 the fiery Italian orator, and ex-Barnabite, Alessandro Gavazzi visited Montreal to espout his declarations against Catholicism. While lecturing at the Zion Church a mob of protesters attempted to enter. The Chief of Police, Charles Oakes, called upon the army for assistance and when the latter attempted to disperse the crowd, shots were fired, and a riot started. Numerous persons were injured, some fatally.

The artist has chosen to depict the most dramatic moment of the event. In the centre middleground, in a large open square, the army has taken position, lined in two long rows with the first kneeling while puffs of white smoke escape from their rifles as they fire. The large crowd which had grouped to protest Mr. Gavazzi, flee in all directions leaving an awesome, dramatically poignant, blank space with two bodies lying on the brown dirt. In the centre foreground men attempt to help the wounded while others vigorously fight police constables carrying long batons. A small building or shack shields some individuals from the shooting. In the centre background is the Zion Church, with St. Patrick's to the right and the Jesuit College visible beyond. St. Andrew's Church and a row of town houses line the square on the left.

View - J. Duncan 1854".
Litt.: ALLODI, i no. 675.

Duncan's main concern in this work is the rendering of dramatic light and atmospheric effects. The foreground depicts an Indian camp; a large tepee on the right, the construction of which is carefully noted by the artist, is in complete shadow, whereas that on the left is highlighted by a golden sunset. Two standing Indian women wearing a red and a blue tunic, and a seated mother with cradleboard cast shadows on the light brown ground. Surrounding the camp are dark green foliated trees with a large bush in the centre being a bright red.
Beyond is the St. Lawrence River with an eastern view of the harbour with sailing ships and the city of Montreal. The buildings are depicted from such a distance and being in the shadow of Mount Royal that the identiification of particular structures is impossible.
The sky which occupies the upper half of the work is filled with fluffy grey clouds which become a golden colour as they reflect the rays of the setting sun.

This work is similar in concern to Cat. 11 d 35, but the effect is considerably more dramatic for being depicted by moonlight. A full, but slow moving river divides the work; on the left are tall, dark green, almost black trees which extend the height of the work. An Indian encampment occupies the right side with canoes pulled up onto the bank in front of two large tepees. In front of these, in a clearing, Indians have gathered around a central smoking fire. A solid wall of dark green, blue trees loom oppressively on the far right. The scene is dramatically lit by a centrally placed full moon which has just appeared from behind thick grey clouds. Its golden light is reflected off the deep blue water, and highlights the left sides of the tepees and the Indian group.

A winter view of St. Helen's Island from the south with the city of Montréal in the distance on the far right. Duncan's viewpoint is from the frozen St. Lawrence River which he renders in great detail in the foreground. A group of fishermen in the centre are portaging a long canoe through the jagged chunks of snow and ice. Two small figures standing on the right are dwarfed by a large bank of ice.

St. Helen's Island occupies the central middleground, it is largely covered with grey unfoliated trees with two long structures (possibly British-Garrison installations) located in a clearing on the far left. Mount Royal is clearly identifiable in the right background but the view is taken from such a distance that the Montréal cityscape is unrecognizable.
MONTREAL FROM THE NORTH

w.c. over pencil, 9 1/4 x 12 3/4.

Coll.: PAC, C-10644.

Inscribed: 1.1. "J. Duncan 1856".

The main portion of this winter view is occupied with the rendering of children in brightly coloured winter outfits, sliding down the north western slopes of Mount Royal. The scene in the foreground is a lively one with children waiting with a long sled at the top of the slope on the left while others enjoy the thrill of the event. One sled at the bottom of the hill on the right has overturned causing a group of adults and children with a horse and sleigh in the centre to laugh.

The city of Montreal and the St. Lawrence River may be seen in the right background. The rendering of the structures is generalized, but the towers of Notre-Dame on the left, and the spires of St. Patrick's and St. Andrews churches in the centre are clearly discernable. On the far right may be seen Victoria Bridge, begun in 1852 and officially opened on August 25, 1860 by Prince Albert. The bridge was an important milestone for Montreal in that it replaced the slow Laprarie ferry as the main route to the south shore and the United States.

Coll.: "J. Duncan".

Inscribed:

A similar subject to Cat. 11 d 40, but here Duncan has rendered the scene by moonlight, and the persons tobogganing are adults rather than children. An empty sleigh with horse and driver is stationed by unfoliated trees on the left. In the centre and right foreground is a group of standing men and women with sleds preparing themselves for the event. The hill in the right middleground is dotted with double and four seater sleds with the occupants holding on tightly as they slide down the steep slope. A lake, or river with islands (possibly Lac des deux Montagnes) is rendered in the left background. A full moon appears from behind wispy clouds in the upper centre portion of the work; its light is reflected off the silver blue water, and it casts a yellow glow over the activity in right half of the work.

Large brownish green trees in the left and right foreground frame the work. The middleground is occupied by a muddy blue lake, two figures in a canoe, one of which is wearing a bright blue jacket, are manoeuvring their craft in the centre while a man and boy watch from the shore on the right. Two large green and brown mountains form a backdrop to the scene. The sky which is rendered in a bright blue wash contrasts the overall dull colour palette of the rest of the work.

An autumn view of Montreal from the eastern side of Mount Royal. Three orange trees extend the height of the work in the left foreground. A group of four brown cows graze on yellow, green grass doted with orange and yellow coloured bushes in the centre. A detailed depiction of the Montreal cityscape occupies the middleground, with Duncan rendering the buildings in various shades of grey and ochre with white highlighting. Dominating the structures in the centre is the large rectangular shaped Hotel-Dieu with its shallow central dome (1860). Beyond, the towers of Notre-Dame (1841 and 1843) and the spires of such churches as St. Patricks (1847) and Christ Church Cathedral (1875) varying skyline. The St. Lawrence River and St. Helen's Island are rendered in a pale blue and green wash in the background, with Monts. St. Hilaire and Orford a pale grey in the distance.

In the centre foreground two small boys stand by the edge of a rock filled, silver-blue stream watching four brown cows grazing in a pale green meadow beyond them. The village of Sault-Aux-Récollets appears in the background. The buildings are surrounded by autumn coloured trees and bushes with the result that only the roofs and sides of some of the small stone houses may be seen by the viewer. On the left the single spire and roof of a church rises above the tops of the trees.

Duncan's viewpoint in this watercolour is looking west along the road which follows the northern shore of Lac des Deux-Montagnes linking Hudson with Como, Quebec. Tall dark green trees in the left and right foreground frame the work. The dirt road occupies the centre of the composition and is lined on either side by yellow, orange and pale green bushes. A mother and daughter with a brown dog walk towards a horse and cart with two standing figures in the middle-ground. On the south side of the road, perched on top of a gentle hill, is Schneider's Inn (now protected as an historic building). The Inn is a two storied structure, made of white washed stone with it's long front porch over-hung by a steeply pitched red roof. Smoke gently escapes from the two large chimneys at either end of the house. Opposite the Inn on the north side of the road is St. Mary's Anglican Church, Como, of the parish of Vaudreuil, built in 1860 and still extant. The church is a cruciform brown stone structure with a steeple on it's southern axis. The entranceway is from a small vestibule located on the eastern side and clearly depicted in Duncan's work. Both structures are surrounded by lush bushes and trees which range in colour from pale green to soft yellow and oranges. Within the left middle-ground, and visible through a space in the trees is the Lac des Deux-Montagnes beyond which on the southern shore may barely be seen

This view looking south towards Lac des Deux-Montagnes was painted from the porch of Riversmead, a large four storied stone house in Como, Quebec, presently owned by Mr. & Mrs. Henshaw. In the foreground is depicted the central circular dirt driveway of the house lined on either side by low pale green and yellow bushes. The owners of the house (who probably commissioned the work) are seen walking with their small boy and a dog away from the viewer. Finely groomed lawns and gardens occupy the left and right portion of the work with autumn coloured trees and a white picket fence separating the property from the public road in the middleground. Through spaces in the trees Lac des Deux-Montagnes may be seen in the background (the trees are today so dense and tall that this view is no longer possible). Beyond the lake on the southern shore Duncan has rendered the village of Oka with the Sulpician Church for the Indians (see Cat. 11 d 53) visible on the far right.

Greene Avenue is rendered in the centre foreground and middleground. Three horse and carts traverse the dirt road while two small boys walk along the stone sidewalk on the right. The road is separated from open brownish green fields on either side by wooden fencing. A small two storied red brick house faces onto the road in the left middleground beyond which, some distance from the avenue is a larger three storied red brick house with two white porches. The mountain in the centre background is heavily foliated with yellow, brown, red and dark green trees. The roofs and upper storeys of three houses may be seen nestled amongst trees. In the left background Duncan has rendered a body of water beyond which are hazy blue and grey mountains. This is curious for the artists' vantage point from Greene Avenue provides no such view. The sky is a pale blue with yellow and pink washes for the clouds.

Newton Bosworth published his Montreal guide book in 1839 and 1846, the first such book to be published in English.
To accompany his written descriptions of the Montreal area, and in particular those of Montreal buildings, he commissioned Duncan to produce pen and ink and wash sketches of specific subjects. These sketches were engraved by P. Christie and included are inscriptions usually identifying the subject in the lower centre, "Drawn by J. Duncan" in the lower left and "Engraved by P. Christie" in the lower right.
The engravings in Hochelaga Depicta represent Duncan's first lithographic production in Canada. Though the compositions are unimaginative the artist has provided great detail and accuracy in his architectural rendering. The work is therefore an invaluable historical record of Montreal in the late 1830's.

The accompanying description by Newton Bosworth is as follows:

"The present market, occupying the ground on which stood the College founded by Sieur Chamol, but destroyed by fire many years back, is 36 yards wide, and reaches from Notre Dame Street to St. Paul Street. In the middle of the space are ranges of stalls for butchers, covered in roof supported on wooden pillars. Great care is taken to enforce the regulations to ensure cleanliness, and the good condition of the meat offered for sale".

Duncan's accompanying illustrations depicts
in the foreground an iron fence and gateway beyond which crowds occupy the open market
space in front of the above described stalls.
In the centre of the composition is Nelson's Monument (designed by Robert Mitchell and constructed in 1809) which is rendered in such detail by the artist that the statue of Lord Nelson on the top of the column is clearly discernible. In the right background is the St. Lawrence River with sailing vessel and steamboat.

Beyond is the St. Lawrence with sailing vessels and the Montreal Harbour. The quality of the engraving in this latter area is poor making the identification of structures difficult. The outline of Notre-Dame however, with caped unfinished towers, is clearly discernable. Duncan depicts Mount Royal in the right background following Bosworth's depiction of it as being "Wooded nearly to its summit but towards the base the forest trees have been succeeded by orchards that produce apples, pears and plums of the choicest flavour" (p. 88). Located amongst these is the Simon McTavish House, begun in 1804.

These entries were most likely included in the August 7th 1852 issue because Montreal had only a few days prior experienced another devastating fire, the subject was therefore topical. four feet high. Its walls, which are of wood, are double, having an intermediate space of thirteen inches, filled with sawdust. The interior is divided into eight equal compartments, of which each is separated from its neighbour by a partition similar to the outer wall, but only ten inches thick. The ice is all stored above ground, because in the winter the temperature below ground is higher than that of the outer air, because in summer the large mass of ice and the nature of the walls afford to it a sufficient protection against the heat, and because the ice so stored is easier of access and transportation. Some level part of the River where the ice is of the proper purity and thickness is selected".

In this view of Montreal from the river

aspects of the city. The River St. Lawrence in foreground is dotted with sailing vessels, steamboats, barges and rowboats. The buildings of the Montreal cityscape beyond are clearly recognizable with the spire of the Anglican Cathedral, designed 1805, and the towers of Notre Dame, constructed 1841 and 1843, dominating the west portion. The most impressive structure is the centrally located Bonsecours Market, designed by William Footner and constructed between 1845 and 1852, a symbol of the growing commercial and political importance of the city (in 1849 it was used as the Parliament Building for the United Canadas). In his depiction of the structure
IV PRINTS

IV 1. (Continued)  Duncan has slightly elongated the central dome and reversed the main facade in order to portray the most impressive features. Newly constructed army barracks and terrace housing occupy the waterfront area immediately to the east. The richly wooded Mount Royal serves as an impressive backdrop to the scene with the house of Simon McTavish (begun 1804) visible on the lower slopes.
IV PRINTS

The following catalogue entries (Cat. IV 3-8) list six prints which are Duncan's first lithographic series. Issued under the title Views of Montreal and Environs they were drawn on stone by the artist from original watercolours and lithographed by Matthews of Montreal. These prints were issued in both black and white and hand coloured sets. The examples documented are the finest extant examples of the hand coloured series.

In 1850 SABONY & MAJOR, NEW YORK (later became SABONY, MAJOR & KNAPP) issued a set of six coloured lithographs under the title Views of Quebec. George Spendlove states that some of the original drawings for this set were done by James Duncan. The whereabouts of the drawings is unknown and since the captions on the prints only state the lithographer involved and not the artist upon whose work they were based the attribution remains unverified. However, on the basis of stylistic analysis three of the six (Cat. IV 9, 12, 14) may be attributed to Duncan. Artists of the balance is a matter for speculation.

Attribution of this work to Duncan is highly probable in that the genre figures in the left foreground and centre middleground are typical of those depicted by Duncan in his watercolours and drawings during the 1840's and 1850's. See notably the SSC Sketchbook (Cat. 11 b).

This print was first issued by Gauvi of Montreal on August 1st 1854 based on an original watercolour by Duncan of the same title (Cat. 11 d 30).
This aerial view is taken from the same spot as the artist's earlier 1849 print
MONTREAL FROM THE MOUNTAIN (Cat. IV 3.).
The foreground cow pasture in the earlier work is now replaced by the garden setting of Temple Grove, Cote des Neiges Road, the then residence of Davis Ross McCord. The buildings of the Montreal cityscape in the middleground are now rendered in a far more detailed manner following the character of the original watercolour. The growing prosperity of the city is revealed by Duncan in his precise depiction of factories in the western portion of the city (complete with smoke coming from the chimneys), and new railway docks to the east. In the distance Monts. St. Bruno, St. Hilaire and Orford dominate the surrounding cultivated plains.

THE SPROULE QUEBEC VIEWS

In 1873-74 the Montreal engraver and publisher Adolphus Bourne (act. 1820-1878) re-issued an 1832 set of four black and white Views of Quebec City and Environs in colour. The original 1832 series had been lithographed for Bourne by C. Hullmandel of London, England based on sketches by the artist Robert A. Sproule (1799-1845). Presumably since the original sketches were no longer extant Bourne commissioned Duncan to paint four watercolour copies from the original prints. 1 (Duncan made slight changes to the figures and genre groups). The Duncan copies were lithographed by C.G. Crehen (1823-?) and published by Bourne as a set of four chromolithographs (Cat IV 18-21). A fifth view (Cat. IV 22) was added by Duncan to the original four.
