ABSTRACT

NOTES FROM AN ISLAND

MATTHEW SANTATERESA

Implicit in the death of a parent or loved one is the bereaved's need to reintegrate or renew an acquaintance with the world based on the fact, the sweeping fact, of his or her mortality. Often the energies released by such an event disperse into a variety of concerns, both coming to focus on the death and reappraising the field of experiences of the world. That is, situations, people, relationships, surroundings take on transient qualities. Contingent upon these qualities comes the reflection of a self with only a tenuous grip on conventional reality, things and people. There arises a variety of confrontations between self and self, self and others, self and surroundings. As never before, the need for retrieving the sense of loss, for its creative possibilities, as well as the need for establishing means of surviving what remains of life, come to be imperative.

The poems for my thesis will investigate both public and private aspects of my own father's death. These poems will follow a chronological order, and in so doing relate the integration of 'death' into my own life, ultimately coming to grips with this unsettling topic, holding its facets long enough to examine and recognize some of its forms, textures and implications before continuing on in the process of staying alive.

Formally, I see the body of poems in three parts:
1) the Elegy for my father, 2) Blue Air Travelogue and 3) Reveille, using the Elegy as a point of departure from which perceptions integrate and insights evolve toward a wholeness of view.
ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I wish to thank Rev. for her love, patience, and devoted efforts in preparing this thesis; Professor Richard Sommer for his friendship and many useful suggestions; and Dr. Mark Cezar with whom some of the themes presented here, were discussed. In addition, I am grateful to Concordia University's Department of English and Faculty of Arts and Science, as well as the Canada Council, whose respective financial supports in the form of an assistantship (1979-80), backing for a literary journal ("Process" - 1977-79), and a junior grant, lightened the writing of this thesis.

I would also like to thank the editors of Quarry (Spring '80) and Atropos (Spring '79) for publishing 'Nothing in Particular' and 'Island Evenings Promise' (as 'Tarahumarian Evenings') in their magazines, and especially Quarry for having accepted 'Scarecrow' and a variation of 'Icarus, after Bruegel', for future publication (Spring-Summer '82).

1) You know Bruegel's painting of Icarus going down indifferent, into indifferent blue and farmer, shepherd, fisherman, attending duties, sun shining as it does down on the 'Charles, dirty' water flowing green as a funeral house lawn, dead end quarry, a green anthracite — gone out of business, a block from Dave's Bar and Grill, sitting in this rickety deadhouse as if nothing happened; the shoes prominently shine, the beard's no mind of its own growth.

Overnight, a shower, and waiting on the runway, birds with settled wings sealed, flight and destination removed, they sit dust softened to muck, the inflight volume on the controls raised as if removed, as if nothing happened, no reality holds.

Children outside under a blue, calling everything away; a dog pisses on a hydrant, clank of his licences slides high almost into colour — the flood of clarity flows into a universe that probably will go on, right by, without you or me — his mistress gives the long line of black cars a glance, gives him a yank, moving past the view I have of you, inside, in your everfirst dark suit, I touch the sharp cold fingertips like a mountain wind down a slope, stand in a quick of time, this ceremony of cancellation, monotony and numberless sins, arranged like Bruegel's figure, proportion, finger pressure painting chilling shades.

The day you suffered a partial stroke, listening to Hoffmann, contemplating the solution to a spill of coffee: nothing has happened since, an ancient thing, the sunlight still melts poorly planned escapes, under pressure children hold up their love, strong and green are led deep into penetrable dark, shades sharp and standing, fresh as always as a flood of heat breaking across what seas, what shore there will be, who will tell you about dream, reality, light, how beautiful it is from the sun, veering, flowing together.
2) If nothing holds us in place (as these cold blooms I breathe out, fading, go out beyond the high branch) not New England cold, not New Haven's broadest welcome, not even the coffin unflinching or your hands' wonderful length, freezing to a touch, or the cross tucked between crossed fingers in prayer, hooked to know-it-all-silence, another side of absence, is no resort yet act as if the world made all the difference.

You did, moonlighter, sleepwalker as if material could hold you while giving some time to pulling down on Sundays prayer's perfect understanding, horns crying out for essential answers from galactic distances as stacked ill-tempered beauties you kept meeting over years, outriding boredom, you said, keeping flickers of youthful fire active, except on Sundays, then with nothing attending a human need you remained, genuflected, and left the grave no answer to anything, and no answering other than the proof of emptiness and your breath holding between words, air, way, way beyond stars' memory, burning all places that sought you, and found, found you like nothing.
3) What happens after the celebration files out slowly from the room, chattering, apologizing, do you remember me, your cousin, the first you made love to at 12, the first you took to the zoo, you've changed and I am married now to an overstuffed no-count accountant, I didn't notice you cry, I am sorry, terribly sorry will you meet me for lunch tomorrow or the next, sometime they know I will try almost anything to forget and try to find a way out of this traction bringing consolations of love and all that habit thrusting has tied me in they know love is a way out for now the flowers stench still burns my nostrils my stomach a dark ache, the added dark of your sewed eyes dream deep into the heart of nothing in shocked recognition I cannot see but soon will fit me straight off the rack in a dark suit, absence fills your name, makes you belong nowhere else, unremembered 4) Your thoughts spread out over the city at the hospital window in your outsize smock covering a city in your scattered fear prayers came to you with a fervor there was nothing else left, I am witness to the arrangements, nothing is missed, cheques signed, obituaries sent off nothing remains to be overlooked, in rapid succession one activity befalls another, a system fills your absence, still words of business culminate in the last hole in the ground, dead and gone

I almost hear your prayers, Hail Marys full of grace not sure the lord is with you, not sure, not sure sounds emerge now and then from outside jack hammers hollow out the ground blessed are you, are you only that blank intimacy of yourself in a run down condition, translucent as frail skin as the window heated by sun you see yourself with an old lover especially the one who showed you her breasts powdered by moonlight in an empty graveyard you become certain of a world that will not miss you that the emptiness you leave behind will fill in with the same air you came in since nothing is for certain BLUE AIR TRAVELOGUES

I've never been as far south as the islands where I'm told the blue air scrapes solitude clean that waves wash under stars, dreams so I'm told that directions have no dark routes that weather is a blue hull, a bright keel that words are a world of light that cloudless nights pass through the head that no memories stop them, history a blank if a man lived there he'd be alive listening to shorelines breathe, waves driving into the green hills of solitude so empty he could hear insects hover over faraway markets, voices that tell him he would forget far, far away whose breath it is who told me

NOTHING IN PARTICULAR

Waves combine in repetitive numbers there are three dogs on the shoreline one brown, one black, one coming into view the motor of a motorboat is being repaired out in the cove what day is it today? Monday the sun catches the leaf tips of a shoreline brush funny, I thought it was Tuesday there are two other boats in the cove Miguel's glass bottom boat rides in the waves a sailboat with an empty mast rides in the waves the brown dog begins to swim out toward the motorboat as the motor of the motorboat begins to sputter the brown dog swims half-way out and returns to the black dog sprawled in the shade on the shore. the third dog is no longer in view beside me, you are putting on nail polish and shooing flies away intermittently hold your hand at arm's length for better perspective in which to test the quality of the shade then bring your hand back continue the polishing strokes intent as waves are as that dog swimming all the way out for the second time being plucked from the ocean by the owner of the motorboat; the motorboat, repaired, heads out to sea, while the other two dogs leave, disappear from the shore. and you, having finished your nails, go inside leaving me, and those other two boats out there, in the sound of unrelinquishing waves, sufficient.

IN EXTREMIS

On an island, in an expanse of sun everything appears, perfect, the shade, an innocence like her unshaved underarms prehistoric and shocked alive love bears the brunt of so much more widows are tanned as unexpected as the cordial strands of blonde pubic hair where she neglected to apply beeswax beyond the bikini line, hot singing sweat glistens off her dark hips a passionate aim at eye level, levels the heart to a naked power spreading for vehement bullets of guns of love — the view from the sitting room is impeccable there is nothing better in the world than love of a good book the sleep of silence cooled, empty the soar that clarity instills in solitude gone are high houses, roofs of suicide, migraines, anorexic girls drinking herbal tea here is time arriving in waves ample time light sways and straightens through the palms the gulls circle in their cries but still a far cry from meaning that subsides into each moment, hardly paradise hardly the world the brochure makes it out to be all that loving, swining, coming, of natural solitude, what is taken for granted is breath, retina, the simple joy they work at all although the water tastes off-color, constipation a threat, the sitting room corner shimmers with a radiant web, dog hairs on my white cotton pants there is always the coke machine in the lobby SCARECROW

Not feeling well I went outside and ventured up the island road having left behind a managed life of conditioned needs in solid order

I went out and up the hibiscus lined path, breathing in sun and scent that turned the nostrils to cathedrals I came upon a field, calm absolutely still, a scarecrow stood fielding nothing, unhurried, I wondered about nothing, about having no sockets of thought to turn to, no breath for intuition, no mouth, to strand together entangled voices, or eyes to lick the tears of brides then approaching into view, your father manhandling hours, repairing borders and his limits, his land, life that built you, makes you stand, watches you as he leans against a trunk having nothing to say, having given you nothing, watches you, look over the nothing he has given you to face edges of light that subside in dark again and again until what is expected of you is natural, actually you hear nothing not even wind turn in you, not even feel the sun kindle you between you and him and the fencepost there is nothing but meadows of looking you only tremble in grooves of wind senseless, you look out to what is left to be done, nothing no strategy planned your limits but unknowing, you become planted a landmark on what becomes the road away from this place LETTER HOME TO NO ONE

Can living here (excursions to summits, rain forest gardens, meanings focussed with cameras breathless shutters, manual industries yellow bird sounds picturesque near the water's edge) sustain me for long?

Yesterday the air conditioner vent broke, and the afternoon towered down in rain between tracts of lightning, hacking thunder the place banging alive in stiff winds buried under the generating water without ceasing at ease, in my room tremors of venetian slats kept on about the winds, cold air about bare shoulders

I laid down on the fresh sheets, hollow damp smell while the weather built up arousing certain imperatives breath, stillness, sounds dangling, darkening owning nothing, wanting nothing, yours.

FOR DRUMMOND de ANDRADE

(after Cantos de Aprendiz)

Think of wilderness to a smooth horizon forests emerald lush in shafts of light palisades, young girls breathing through blouses think of it as yours: embroideries of languages, real estate dreams, to your ploughshares unpaved boulevards, the dust your Silver Ghost makes, the wind in your lapels, the leaves that fall as you move past them the world is your crew under sun and stars your air force on the runway mandalas of all colors cover skins of B52s jet engines rev, a cantata to the end of wars you called for your countrymen await you on crowded streets, bow, kissing the air you breathe you are prince of Turmalinas everyone waves under the giant shades for you deep behind leaves of the rain forest your heart dreams of night filling with bioluminous paradise birds colors of every sort, the dead, entangled, drop behind only the least wounded make it here the high refracting diamond-backs, enriched butterflies, peacocks think of it as all yours and at the proper hour, emerge on your balcony, Jequita, a warm glass of milk in your hand

The sky full of whirring, sounds of empty white music, colors that asphyxiate sight you hardly breathing yourself Juquita HAGGLING

Complex reductions disintegrate in the sun to simple ones:

a black woman's transparent beads for sale, centerless and clear right through you get a sense of placement, without direction, haggling down the price: the vendor's fantasy of wealth overpriced, of worth adjusted in tender management of words and gestures of peripheral issues that center on uselessness (the hidden agenda being how useful it is like the broad loops of birds sweeping through skies in delight in such blue as blue is the slim warm smell of bananas about her smile a white belt, I smile as if knowing, but unknowing an extrusion from nothing dawns on me, the bead's positive value a ruffle of nothing, radiates in a market, imagined along with the real, together invisibly clear, beyond expense taking on another beauty, always like blue ON THE WAY BACK.

In flight back:
and so much for the holiday, it was a glimpse back into light, idyll, dream much like an ornithologist in carribea lost up sunny dusty roads his binoculars improving slight pangs of rare birds as he goes, returning over and over terrain, inspired points for light where thinking he saw flashes of underbellies of leaves, feathers looking for the light that flies rarely.

I never felt that way before, funny (those were his last words, laid out translucent) and grass primed and attentive for each twitch (the floss white scheme of his teeth) associations called, named, and identified springs, into a note, and taking note of markings, time fibrillation is enough to react to the trained eye that brings back to life the sight and sound of where motions are wild with sudden leaves recognized (his sucking breath, mauve lips)

I scan like the ornithologist returning to the place of a released sound, to make returning a way of staying away, imperceptible camouflaged, attentive part of where light is not choosy to fall and translucent, remain still to moments about to move

the smoke of the inflight cigar held in a right hand turns back against the wrist (his hand still warm feeling nothing, light) RETURN

So much for the recovery so much for wanting to be alone I take a ghost ship home it flies like wind, moves through shanty town's sad features, takes off to the outlying ocean. I wrap the sun in sun and stow it away of death, I sail into it there is nothing else I can do it steals what it must

I save what I saw said what I had to say and make a return out of staying away.

TROUBLE OF MINE

I begin, not saying anything I remain at the edge of possible words a few have already moved, still back and forth in revision of each other setting off what is partially known what is partially up in the air I begin to call it an impossible habit to break then, a nice wreckage of lungs and breath one word like dark emerges from nowhere a momentary black map out of directions barely defines an aim in black air ascends into itself, full tilt only to find the light celebrates its emptiness, descends that word is dreadful no one bothers to accept it as if nothing mattered another word in its trail resonates the empty friction after the fact in the ear, noses down goes in its headful turn in deep air this one appears to survive, smoulders in intense wonder about re-entry into an atmosphere thick as thought concerns itself in a resonance of gravity about proper angles for coming down to earth, landing or blown to bits become a language of stars' utter stillness, seen from years away or not at all LIBRARY REVISITED: IN SEARCH OF INSPIRATION (after M.S.)

Poems and poems Some lump like stone in the drain of my throat others bypass or scorn the heart others still stroke the brain plenty brag about a penis reborn ink dribbles down corners of my mouth, my eyes mirror a deep black socket of words whose whorls I liquefy more and liquify descend and drink and a librarian in black velvet dress, incredulous eyes, views the carrel I filled with my black fingerprints, she does not confide in one so content shaking her head she goes closing the lights, I finish and hear her soft quick rustle of nylons diminish down the hall her talc, I pick the scent and dogs she unhooks after being all day, from a basement dark they emerge, bioluminescent eyes, unfed pinschers, they speed upstairs smelling the night's light, their tongues taste the gift of their fangs intent

I hear her sobbing swell she can see how I'm rewired how my eyes are beacons as well how in quiet dark a rare fuse fired and on all fours I nudge her thighs I lick the back of her hand and back I turn and disappear through stalls alive fresh, illumined in verbs unsleeping and dark WHAT MORE THAN

Language, a motion calls you, reconnaissance.
re-knowing, terrain like a window I walk to and face, calling the names of things by proper names after the fact of things not having names not even thinking and thinking which is a motion naming, and naming is as much a risk as motion that calls language a means of getting motion down exactly more than it relates instilled with more that is GALILEO'S LOVER

'I discover myself
like a telescope recording your complexion of bruised light for posterity, darken pages of proof that dictate what I apprehend, I must not omit without certain wonder over your prominences, as to light and shade offering relief

I think of myself like you, indifferent to a world and luminous rugged, tracts lumped in an origin no one is sure of never dreamed that immaterial light along your lips that are so white, shadows slope and rise, ranges over your shape looking over you asleep in a dark, luminescent which would mean nothing otherwise had I not seen you in a different light' GALILEO NOTICES SOMETHING HAS BEEN STOLEN after Basho

'I discover a thief has come grabbing a few things: telescope, chalice, etc. he must have returned to the night wrapped in its darkness endless scent of the dead stealing through back alleys abandoned among stars. voices of Paduans covering his footsteps out the fragrance of escape smelling sweet down the highway heading south his solitary breathing just wanting to live his own life counting the waves off Syracuse counting the shooting stars as he goes beyond his own reach envious of how they have no tracks that's freedom he thinks of the moon
he left behind priceless'
in the night, no streets are dampened by light rain no palms hang over hard green grasses in fact no landscape at all occasionally I look out the window there is a gyrating silver that whizzes past there are no winds this far north, airless I breathe artificially on measured air my mind floats in its black I will reach the other half of the orbit soon the signs of life are minimal my breath, for one, always begins as long as the sun appears, reappears as long as the organs work as long as lines of long distance are kept open, I hold this pattern elliptical, moving from horizon to horizon breath is all I have, I see a blue sphere spin in emptiness a transmission monitors vital signs my outside is in here light seeps from the bottom of dark, I see out there from behind a blue substantial cloud of earth the colour of arrival implicit as departure I hang further from everything I sleep to awake, awake to sleep I fade into the light

I fade into the dark I say hello to the black of everything holding the promise of light, like breath' EINSTEIN

'I discover myself
without having done all what remains of my life I manage to turn back the clocks but decades and decades have gone no intensity or formula can apprehend their textures gone.

what good is it I lose myself in time the hours have done a number on me teoretically, should I start I go on forever with what I do I rise in electron clouds, I mushroom out with possibilities that are immortal yet I never sing how can I, even time tells me what I am I change more and more into less and less I forget mankind, a rush of a bird, wild in shaken leaves and looking up from my blueprints

I see time, how stubbed it is, curves in all dimensions intangible I see what sufficiency it has I do, honestly, I do' PLANT

Days stream past waiting for light and water to transform the motions by which I remain still I live in my own shade perfect to all extremities, a waxy glint to my skin as it moors on air I live at light's speed and feel the dark tropism move through illumined branches I grow in its complications and bound only by light and dark that falls over leaves I hold space and fit perfect in its days when she comes to water this earth, instinct absorbs elements, I live on its dark dependency, without bothering to question the way I go on, standing for centre and peripheries though today, I hear her voice speaking next to me, when she speaks she says everything is, everything in love but I sense she is thinking of death thinking of her lover's absence without her the sun falls through the glass I sit in a light of facts what else can I do I wait and watch

I see the green bones of relatives laid out in the ground she talks and I bathe in promises that die, of light taking arduous root THERE IS NO LIFE LIKE MINE

A mole, scholar of dirt clanging out tunnels a shovel (brand name: Black and Blacker digs deep and deeper) people wait outside on streets for the end of something meetings are called to order I continue to dig for something still to be heard

I speak through tunnels like a megaphone a voice that fades past echoes to no one hearing or caring

I must walk back home further each night I quit earlier each night until all I do indefinitely is spill out stories to the studious dark

I remember T-shirts emblazoned with sentiments I remember her at the trap door in our cellar wearing one I remember at first how I whispered at length about my large member into her excited ear I remember how we had no idea what got into us but lately I find myself talking to glints of what I think is moonlight off the shovel in a deep tunnel lately I find myself thinking of dinners that went cold of her waiting for me to come, to come home all earth and desire, all ways with hoarse love lately I am unable to comprehend the shift the roar of time that tunnels magnify, that my life arrives in that my life leaves in I picture the snow on the screen left unclosed in her bedroom

I see the tunnel was nicer then how I had wished something would come of it I would have more trouble remembering and your forgetting would help as well as if I freeze and tuck my knees under my chin, close my eyes for good and not see you beside me, illumined carrying in your arms a vacuum cleaner darker than the one I have ENDING THE CONTRACT THAT BEGINS WITH I

I, being in the sound of noises next door of people making love take to heart this erasable bond to bathe in the empty wake of years the blank passion I left unrecognized figuring it would not add up to much week-ends emptied writing epitaphs in retreat as if the present were mine all the indications point to life elsewhere the present is black, it does not move the present is dark I leave it to its absence. to its pointless distribution of thoughts about family life, and the few furtive sexual stirs for others

I leave them to themselves and to those others who phoned and found the line dead to those beautiful women with blonde blonde voices wanting me to perpetuate their families I leave them with lies, recorded poems that praise the need to be beautiful to analysts whose relationships were never clear I leave unsayable truths in unspeakable situations I leave the insurance of my absence; its premium where words can make nothing out of especially nothing

I leave nothing more for you whom I could never figure out but it is yours to do with as you want ELEGY (M. SANTATERSSA 1950— ) whatever errors were made were made out of yearning to be warmer, more human if that is humanly possible, and not for the sloth of cash, the beauty who promised nights of fearless flying nor did the errors go scot free that would make the end of my life empty crimes of a little fear, yes but to see old age loud and stupid lounging in silence passive to nothing on a Florida beach or to become a brass-knuckler tearing out blood avulsing eyes or someone insane with bits of change in his pocket like pieces of a world, unable to fit things together, or a cruel doctor drunk on worldly possessions doing nothing more for pain never although I am not sure since nothing is certain I see myself a little clearer now, lenses closer to the prescription of a more competent optician everything goes: man-made, natural and at any moment

if you are coming to see me, hurry up this moment too, is so dark and perfect it will never even last this long FINAL BRIEF ELEGY

I want to say simply for the last time that his cheek was torn and that there will be no healing and that is that what my ritual good-bye kiss did out of duty and love and may there be nothing to remind you of blood in a first morning light looking out the kitchen window my father's death in phantom limbs of your arms' embrace his unkempt appearance as if alive when he wore your lipstick and makeup of celebration, mother

I want to say simply for the first and last time, father hello and good-bye SINS OF OMISSION

What I've left out these years I've left out of yearning and now long after I hear a hum a proof of nothing in particular only the empty music of absence I left out of what I thought had weight, turns out and remains to be heard, hangs around the end of evenings a thought that never occurs" HOMAGE TO S. FREUD

Father,
I notice your shut lids the empty engagement you always wanted opening forever behind them on to a landscape of perfect quiet is what mourners really come for to admire, Freud said, a difficult task completed, the dead have no burden to negotiate in breathless grace as the rigorous peripheries of your dying contract toward resolution: tracings, brief histories are saints in homes, hospitals whose incentive for nothing is chronic, whose lives, interruptions between years desire grave epitaphs, embedded names in stone, simmering, dreaming in weathers, undiminished while walking down, hungry with plenty of time, between the promise and profundity of graves, visitors bringing flowers, confessing over the buried the aches that living owes, the absence living makes, without them niggle, being shallow, unknowing so Freud said, that no coward rests in peace, only the living malinger, paying no attention: to nature's direct calls until taking nothing in, assume too much:

bless me I waver, I yearn with incestuous love for the limelight of summer places, passions taking hold, without an everlasting thought N O B O D Y C O N F E S S E S A L I F E L I K E T H I S W I T H O U T A R E A S O N

Like a dead thing
I watch the sky hang up towels

I dally to and fro My wife's not a wife yet, but a love over the trees, or a boulevard of green or a loose light in a ceiling I turn to

I can say the wind cuffs me unexpected, tosses, and exposes a bald spot, as I open a poem, catching an unsettling glimpse of myself in a bookstore window and the poem in progress leaves slumbers under breath.

But at the park today in a fracas, a child who frisked on a bicycle seat, cheek to cheek light as a thought of apples, chatted afterward on my knee, about men who wear purses, as she, fondled my member like a Woolworth's doll

I lost my erection I have lost something else somewhere along the line ELEGY, 1969

Sometimes when I answer the phone it goes dead around your breath in the receiver and when I sleep, the hairs fall out of my head like yours did and in the morning I gather them for you

I put them beside your portrait; foot up on the running board of a black '48 Buick, in a long winter wealth its venerable engine purred home into your sleep, not before holding the baby in the air, contracts springing like guitar strings from your outsized coat pockets awake, the wheels of routine emerged fulfilled in technique, lost in love-making I am in the same morass at times you slaved to fasten loopholes to fill time in a small band of gold of rubber of music circled your life, even your last confession was for a band of saints, for the Big Band which after all you could not be in all alone GOING AND COMING

A moment, a glance a Pulsar watch infuses its crystal clear notion into nothing, instant after instant forgetfulness goes forward dumbest aphorism going on time honoured law, a false language but what's the option? Nothing is on time not even you, coming into sexual stirrings, yearnings brimming with the music they don't want willing to risk your littleness, continue the foreplay, studious like Icarus intent on flying and later the Wright Brothers further countries, moon, stars with a lesser idea of time or none at all on a Himalayan mountain, a Sherpa discovers a frozen body, later to be a prepubescent girl once who broke her leg, fell off a bicycle grew up to become a mother, married a mountain climber, devoted to her husband sent all her three children to ballet classes clips a camera, hoary exposures ravelled in a synthetic passion that emanates from cigar store magazines Variations, Pillow Talk, in order not to starve a moment burns ignorant on my wrist to whatever tenth of a second, coming, goes.

ELEGY FOR NO ONE

For who never was opening a few doors, connecting one foot after another, one room to the next, not knowing if you left or are leaving who stands at the window with the empty chambers of trees whose life is no life at all who just bought a gun, saying bon voyage to bon voyage only to return from your absence to find nothing changed, nothing remains the same to anybody you know, knowing you were already gone before asking anyone to keep you here until you got back, at least unrecognized, already gone I enhance this fine day with objectives in mind having given up broad managements single-minded, focus to perpetrate your absence in the vicinity of mind, love that turns to anger to blue death eerie, how I think of each step broken down pieced together, picked the aztec lock, jiggled the dials free ignite the burst with ice cold will, rise bright, I am your knife, sharp tongue, turbulent lover gone going headlong, headlight up into your sky, your son of a bitch, ancient warrior who rides his spear my helmet glints at you your white roof below, and Blue I see him yawn, his canines part blood, is my cargo, this Aztec always written in blood painted in red near the engine propels me to picture you in your, vogue room like clockwork, home, to the left of your, shelves of washable doll's eyes, focus a mirror fill with your clamourous gifts the seventy-seventh stroke down your blonde hair and I, having strafed low enough to scatter neighbour's weak hearts, rise one last time wings, light, to five thousand and bank, let the throttle go the Aztec smells your ripe heart the knife recognizes its kin the spear its target. the bird out of hiding from the sun drops neighbours begin to look away into the drone from nowhere and you, the ninetieth stroke entranced

all the light in the world does not penetrate this darkness the satisfaction of love fiercer than earth, for this plane beelines from higher and higher descends, receives light of no regret, sees past your last breath, toward the commodious room 'in stillness grows past worms and roots that hold my service, entangled there tooled metal and sod, flesh a guest to its ignorant guise I violate, eaten bone and passion receding from life I grow closer into my death, accepting what I cannot see, no light dances in this grave, and broken shivered, fly, damp earth against my neck, your neck gone broken, too, your throat gargles no less, the earth my dying tongue tastes the dark' room locked in steel

I keep inside my head
HOLDING PATTERN

1) A cigarette's violet plume rises the flame goes out, succumbing to boredom rhythms of solemn trees twinge immersed in a landscape of words, people, and things, not mine but a moment, hold, as if from a fever survive a moment's loss a little deeper the afterimage of flame goes out and alongside things come to light serving a loss as well as enlivening the dead in the telling of how its occurrence spread in a world a hinge so oiled, so right no one escaped its turning without thinking

2) When thinking is there to turn to patterns form, possibility troubleshoots the nearest skirmish, grapples limit against limit when thinking fails, circling results when the short-circuitry is repaired and love lands once again in the last word, thoughts of departure lines the gymnastic joy of tendons glad that thinking is there to turn to glad to have landed at all when thinking extends beyond itself no limit is unmanageable no luggage, light enough.

ICARUS
   after Bruegel

Icarus is having a hard time, hoisting in the brunt of sea breath after breath scissory legs, poise of ripples emanate loss, no one hears, no one cares nature is indifferent, art a bowlful of ironies, antonyms and such gravity, delight hangs on a page, the colored photograph asleep, appetite, knowledge arouses its power, vision a dream, finding ourselves alone like the gruesome threesome: farmer, shepherd, fisherman each a lasting look at nothing, delightful and grave but then again our nature is to fight nature even as the sun rolls crazy and free Daedalus flying, no dead heat subverts his wings, a piece of candy to him the view is fine, nice isn't it his son, a buoy throbbing in the inlet going under for good, has to believe in death a sweeping fact, after the screams go into strangers' ears like silence have I missed the point? to scream against the print, cut off look look at Icarus, what pain would change the wilful brush.

am I a curiosity seeker? who peers into mangled wrecks, finds a corollary warmth in insult to what is dead and gone, then what better way than to recognize fact and let it go believe in death and get on with it grief doesn't last for long at any rate oils, ink, clay is where the trouble starts a private hell to make the profane sacred, then sacred profane and so on for metaphors of freedom, independence art aches unflinching remains an enigma drawn to light yet quite shadowy, more and more about less and less where levels of thought meet dark and light to carry on a dialogue that subsides into silence, after all the rest exists in a joy of a perfectly depicted day there are faint smiles on the figures decisive in their labours, the composition contingent on the retina's miracle, sun shade it is a perfect day, nothing could be clearer, the sails of a ship headed out to sea, lighter, abler in fair weather

BLUE FACTORIAL

after Mallarmé

Hours. silence fingers empty pages, aquarium fish navigate quiet tones whisper past blue's serene irony.
How much time it has, nothing improves it; meditations flow and it stays, no mind to match its cold miles, to think.

eyes closed, running from its stone-age remorse from cerulean estuaries, anything blue.
I call in marsh gas, its swells of contempt, its backed up sewers, taking its hand to fill those blue holes birds keep making let industry smoke up long barreled stacks, asphyxiate the sun, lulling in yellow fusions on horizons

I'll take Punta Norta, deadland beyond the Carribean circuit, back past mothers' milk to hard brocades of slate where happy beasts lie drying the lost idyllic, lost, emptied in windy straits where no art is cosmetic there, depleted, I yawn to death.

But blue survives - as always.
There churches spire constantly up as if in ancient song, holler and haunt, periphery and focus alike, indispensable voices, blue, push us into the ground, frightening through mist and absence in living skin, heart and thoughts slightest turn, smack up against
REVEILLE

1) Rise and shine in the morning view light lies aired in the leaves green the grass shaken, the clouds smoke a moldy steeple scants the sky for hope an engine in the distance turns over in a grave of oil an armature of sparrows pivot on air rinsing a coffee cup out 2) The window was open all night a north wind comes through the venetians a habit of airing out sleep with cold like a shock of rubbing alcohol that loosens an unflinching ache and leads to sleep

she is still asleep, the venetians fibrillate a cold music through slats unwinds chatters into dark for nothing 3) You awoke in a motel in the custody of cack crows and a cockroach's eyes where the travel clock wheeled knowing you would not stay when it rained you stayed in bed listening to rain's one syllable on the thin wood roof wondering who fathered the air and listening to your own breath thinking it was no one's.

4) There you thought of snow, of days up north, hills like blank pages that forget us the numerous strangers we grow into and sometimes we step so far out of ourselves, that there is nothing left except the motel in rain the snow mile after mile the extinct stillness that breathes under the cockroach’s belly the prayers you never said over absent years the shadows pulling on their gloves one by one leaving you alone to breathe SELF-PORTRAIT

I emerge alone in a white room a solitary window and no furniture I am still covered in dirt and a song of stone struck by metal rings in my ears from digging through tunnels and tunnels and though my deep love of depths should end here I still moon over the inevitable looking out the sleep of window that will close down about the trees like radar I hear night approach the incoming casualty of leaves turning purple, wind that slips like the sound of rain over surfaces but I sense you in the room as well a faint whisper of a stain in the corner of my eye, I have no reason to fully acknowledge you, I preserve your absence as I stay alive to your close-quartered moves and wonder about your lack of gravity like the one small insects have using us for names, you cockroach, for instance having such gifts as standing on a wall or ceiling or feeding in dark plumbing, blueprints of our greed, evolving through rejections and so on so don't reproach my love, cockroach for periphery, since if I snapped a picture of this room with you in it you'd be the moon, (I'd be invisible in the upper left hand corner of the negative proof, liking to think you are partially stunned in a flash of recognition and partially indifferent SORT OF IDYLL

In my mind I listen, like a native, ear and nose to the musty ground, to hear the line scoot out ahead of its source, instead, the urban noise lifts above verandas, turning over above the worn map of streets, but somehow the wonder is never lost, even now, in waves of sunlight, a wing swoops, brushing a leaf alive, and across the street, a big-eyed lover takes her in a caliper embrace, all smiles and breathing, strolling further, the wind rising from back lanes, gathers the hot smells of leavings; sebaceous juices, catpiss and dead blooms, left broken open, spilling back into the world like stained perfections, emptying out in a slow burn, downwind scattering no place, silent, restorative in fathoms of air, beyond surprise, dispel to where they appeared to begin.

AFTERLIFE

Our music continues, insufferable never going far enough, fades out of earshot disappears into love, loving what fades like dark that takes the longest time to darken a level of thought in the body placing sound that still remains to be heard, the sound of the place that resonates dwelling there, call it memory call it art, or both, or what you like exiled from exile is all that sound can place flowing for an instant, dilate and subside, dangles, darkens somewhere between home and the corner grocery store or where in approaching the light, you are up in the dark, carrying on a monologue of unnamed clichés pacing in the house where you live alone on an upper floor curtains drawn, breath succeeding breath rising through occasions, after life low moments a taking to sound, words that rescue pain then sleep, being tired then dream in the place where nothing is clear in a lasting look after life the sound of nothing arrives, undisguised UP NORTH

Up north, loitering among ampersands of trees, that give way to an edge of field, parenthetically, past the lights of hotels, traffic of urban love and hate toward families on a beach far enough away to hear only a fray of shouts, that leave on wind to fade, an afterthought the sounds, years away, actually I left each step to itself, and only took notes after, loving what fades a habit, like long walks and like all habits yearns to be still and it's just too bad the summer ends, longer darks sweaters, snow, soundless the vital born to stop, ironies continue, the last note I have observes, on a July evening, how bathing trunks are hung on branches, how the wind leaves through them, as if the dead are trying on the ones that appear to fit A FINAL SEQUENCE

Today you forgave me the felony went unmentioned of having a little fear of breathing your air, earlier

I am no longer the same person I sit and smoke and change and think I am the smoke drifting over the seat, above my head Montreal, as smoke does past the furniture sales past the invisible view of the cemetery and the trees up north in fading light and it no longer matters, that for instance I am something ordinary, a chair or the cold gleam of rain on his lawn as he showers, that's okay

I only say this to the guardian of my absence who naps on a king size bed under the hum of a summer fan and still she sits testing ampoules, of perfume which recall many times leafing through old associations and new each cell feeling its way out depths of various light 2) Waking today, my body a white thing is not ashamed of itself anymore since this morning is the morning after my death what is there to say, and what's more what desire to say anything and these flies buried asleep in sun against the screen, and the janitor's child running past after seeing me in undershorts through the window knows instinctively the weight of a dead man what can children do except laugh what can that fan do but hum, fierce sun what can it do but shine despite the loss of everything I need everything exists, maybe a little older looking the way the dead look suddenly older, yet able to do nothing, moved by air 3) What is a poem anyway but recognition of a darkness that, say, resides inside a horn (how many of us blow our own) as if trying with sharps and flats to dislodge that darkness though knowing it cannot be displaced into the air, and after shaking out the spittle, receiving the pats our backs implore for such solos ends, it will still remain, as if a high note no one can reach or play as if the dried blood in the sleeve of the dead throat that mourners bend over to listen for nothing but this poem is left of that and even then, when you are gone when the mourners leave the poem will be crumpled and thrown into the dark street around it, sparrows will feed on discarded bits of food a man will awaken from his deathbed hardly cured and ask where his son has gone

the words which point out to him the direction will not be mine nor the dark he arises in but I will be that silence that slips out of sight around a corner, a note of silence in which a motor turns over, starts in a dark and fades away down the street

A FRAGMENT FROM A LITANY adapted after M. Strand

"This is the hole I dig and must lie in" I have no way around it, I climb in and celebrate the mail that passes as if clouds in deep blue light above my head I celebrate the south, the solitude of its weather I celebrate the dogs that laze who will never be their own masters I celebrate the voices of families that look over the acres of sand on a beachhead I celebrate the small crabs of the beach that are shy with considerate hiding I celebrate the lovers tanned to perfection I celebrate the coral chambers that form exotic households I celebrate the hum of a conditioner the cold front of its noise.
I celebrate the quiet white breakers on Martinique afternoons I celebrate the motel room, its house-cleaned view of waves and sun, fresh as new linen I celebrate the ruins left by war the motives I share with a mirror, to go on I celebrate the locked-in air of empty suitcases the promise of renewals, the air sadness has I celebrate the landscapers who talk of spirits among the various trees.
I celebrate the north that lives indoors in depths of dark rooms I celebrate the waves of my arrivals, the waves of my departure the wind that carries them in all directions I celebrate the center of peach, oyster, cherry brain and heart, the various paths to their core

I celebrate the air in unborn lungs, beginning

I celebrate infinitesimal dark, those I have abbreviated, those that remain

I celebrate the wings of approaching birds, the speck of a gull in the distance, wings of an embryo

I celebrate the apples of Rougemont, the open market of Jean Talon, the cold light of fall

I celebrate the electronic watch that blinks on my wrist telling my pulse what it already knows

I celebrate the stores that I pass speeding into a future

I celebrate all manner of guile that accommodates a mistress

I celebrate the loyal who accentuate the wind with their love

I celebrate the roofs of mouths, the slanted stucco roof of the Bambou Hotel

I celebrate the bodies that self-immolate, that burn for no reason or many reasons

I celebrate the owners' hearts of corner stores who stay open all night

I celebrate mistakes, revisions, miscalculations. for what they are not

I celebrate the yawn that gapes like a cave of nothing

I celebrate the man in the moon for his vigilance

I celebrate the sun for its courage, over and over

I celebrate nothing that dreams me I celebrate myself for whatever knack I have and the source of all knacks.

I celebrate the incentive to celebrate the hope it promises for revival.

I celebrate the pain of progress, the joy of setbacks the strategic ways we have of saying I am dying.

I celebrate the breath of who reads this and makes it much clearer than my own.
