THE SOUND IN A FOREST

Ross Leckie

A Thesis
in
The Department
of English

Presented in Partial Fulfillment of the Requirements for the degree of Master of Arts at Concordia University Montreal, Quebec, Canada

February, 1982

© Ross Leckie, 1982
ABSTRACT
THE SOUND IN A FOREST
Ross Leckie

The first section of this thesis is titled Unravellings and is comprised of a group of lyric poems written in free verse. The poems have a wide variety of diction and theme but some common technical concerns: the development of the prosaic line; the incorporation of surrealist images in a naturalistic setting; and the restoration of abstraction, hyperbole, flatness of tone and understatement, paradox, and decorous language.

The second section is Other Correspondences, a series of dramatic monologues spoken by famous authors. The technique of these poems is one of juxtaposition, taking the lines and fragments of lines from the authors' journals and letters, as well as lines imagined by myself, and arranging them in an order which gives a particular colouration to the speaker. The art is something of the cinematographer's splicing together of the discovered images into a coherent whole.

The final section, entitled Meditations, is made up of musings on themes similar to the meditations of Cartesian philosophers, transposed into the metaphoric conceits of poetry. Aside from the traditional concerns of the methodology of reason and the role of philosophy, my poetic meditations are also concerned with the nature of language and the role of art.
TABLE OF CONTENTS

Introduction ................................................................................. 1

UNRAVELLINGS
The Cormorant Sonnet ................................................................. 5
The Abstract Curtains .................................................................. 6
The Broken Web ........................................................................ 7
Noam Chomsky ........................................................................... 8
Joaquin Flauta Envisions His Death ........................................... 9
Enamel Casserole ....................................................................... 10
Elegy for John Lennon ................................................................. 11
A Guy Named Hal Suspects A Devious Treachery ................. 12
dead syncopated ...................................................................... 13
A Timely Murder ....................................................................... 14
The Tannenbaum Requiem ......................................................... 15
A Scarred Landscape ................................................................ 16
Toxic Waste .............................................................................. 17
Red Light .................................................................................. 19
Essence ..................................................................................... 20
The High Score ......................................................................... 21
Inflation .................................................................................... 22
Dissipate Scents ....................................................................... 23
Extractions ............................................................................... 24
The Silence of Paper ................................................................ 25
Transportation .......................................................................... 26
Alternate Beginnings and Endings ............................................ 27
Island ....................................................................................... 28

OTHER CORRESPONDENCES
Vincent Van Gogh ...................................................................... 30
Soren Kierkegaard .................................................................... 31
Ludwig Wittgenstein ................................................................. 32
Jean Cocteau ............................................................................. 35
George Santayana ...................................................................... 36
George Bernard Shaw ........................................ 37
Maxim Gorki .................................................. 40
Leo Tolstoy ................................................... 41
August Strindberg ........................................... 44
Arthur Schopenhauer ....................................... 46
Franz Kafka ................................................... 48
Cesare Pavese ............................................... 49

MEDITATIONS:
I The snowflakes tumble .................................... 51
II I was the perfect lover .................................... 52
III Stepping out of the bush ................................. 53
IV Between icy tundra ....................................... 54
V There, in those distant mountains ....................... 55
VI When I was an old man ................................... 56
VII I come to an end of words .............................. 57
VIII Why are there essents ................................. 58
IX The crystal glass .......................................... 59
X Skilled compositors ....................................... 61
XI From a dark place ........................................ 62
XII When I have intimations ................................ 63
XIII I come to the gracile crocus ........................... 64
XIV When I see ocean ....................................... 65
XV René remembers how he met God ..................... 66
XVI The insidious science ................................... 67
XVII Thinking about those two physicists ............... 68
XVIII It is necessary to register ........................... 69
XIX The words! ............................................... 70
XX Come, dear reader, into this wire cage ............... 71
INTRODUCTION

Poetry has become an old rag being squeezed dry. When we think of the "Do's and Don't's" of poetry in the twentieth century it is the "don't's" which have dominated. Only the finely chiselled image remains in the modern minimalist poem. But all this chiselling has cheated poetry of its strength. "Pare the poem down to the bone!" has been the rallying-cry of minimalists. "No!" I cry to these vivisectionists. Let's put the syntactical muscle back onto poetry. Even a certain amount of fat remains beautiful in the appropriate places as was shown by the Renaissance painters. I call for a return to poetry of all the abandoned devices: abstraction, hyperbole, flatness of tone and understatement, paradox, fantastical imagery, narrative voices and narrative technique, dramatic monologue, and even non-functional decaprous language, as if we were not allowed to play in poetry. "The image must remain pure," says Robert Creeley. These puritans accept a line only if it does work. I demand leisure time! Let the line play and make fun. The reader will find all of the abandoned poetical devices mentioned above in the following poems.

A theory of prosody has been developed, notably by Paul Fussell in Poetic Meter & Poetic Form, that poetry needs a metrical constant as a base from which to develop interesting metrical variations. The excitement of poetry exists in the tension created by the reader's expectations of the metrical constant and the poem's variation from that metrical constant. Most of the great English poems use an iambic pentameter base and create their astonishing effects by meaningful variation from the iambic pentameter. The dilemma of free verse is that it has no metrical constant from which to vary. According to Fussell this leaves free verse without a prosodic theory. One historically important theory of free verse is the theory of 'breath' put forward by Charles Olson in his "Projective Verse" essay. Olson suggests that the natural rhythms of breathing can determine the length of the lines as well as the length of the pauses between lines. This theory might be an adequate prosodic explanation for the minimalists but it left me without explanation for my long lines of prose syntax, usually complete with all the definite and indefinite articles and connecting words. I have developed, through the practice of my poetry, a new prosodic theory of free verse. My theory is also a theory of tension between the reader's expectations and the variations by the poem from the expected rhythms. What has changed is that my poetry no longer varies from an iambic pentameter base but varies from a prose base. The lines of the poems establish the syntax and seemingly random rhythms of the prose sentence. The variation from a prose rhythm is created by the line break. The line break cuts the prose syntax in unusual places creating new units of words within the flow of the prose rhythm, giving these new word units new emphases of meaning. The poetic tension is created first by establishing the expectations of a prose rhythm and then establishing interesting metrical variations through the use of the line break.

The method of construction of the poems in Other Correspondences needs some explanation. These poems are comprised of lines quoted and paraphrased from the letters and journals of famous authors combined with some lines imagined by myself. The poems are dramatic monologues purporting to be the speeches of these famous authors. They participate, perhaps, in the tradition of 'found poetry'. The art is something of the cinematographer's splicing together of the discovered images into a coherent whole. The technique of these poems is one of juxtaposition, taking the lines and fragments of lines and arranging them in an order which gives a particular colouration of the speaker. Like most dramatic monologues, the poems say less about their speaker than about my own thoughts and concerns. They are, in this sense, my interpretations of the authors' texts.
The Cormorant Sonnet

A cormorant stands near the water
The pages of my notebook ruffle like feathers
The black letters stand on a silent white shore
I am continually eroding towards the sea
The cormorant is like all other black birds
Its beady eye swells and crests and then subsides
A slight breeze passes through my hair
I fade in noon's monody of light
The notebook whispers with white sand
The dream cormorant pecks me on the ear
Am I a fine practitioner of demonomancy?
The pages of my notebook lift on white wings
I love my cormorant
Black drifts overhead with split legs
The Abstract Curtains

I live in this room of sky's futility.
A bird scratches its way out of the old chimney vent
and rushes the window,
its head drums
the transparent skin of glass.
It moves in the folds of my blanket.
Only a quiet rustle.
At the front door
as a great magician
I conjure a speckled bird
from a ragged quilt.
My thoughts are clouded with metaphysical raisins
which cluster around stem
and leave me wondering
where my joy has flown.
The Broken Web

it was the modern earthquake / when the mirror
finally cracked / and the lamp was blown out /
the cephalate with rugged claws / chirruping
a love song / and a caged beard croaking cantos /
it was a random ringing of bells / a noise, that raised the dead / a cacophony of conversation / teacups rattling in their shells / it was a drunken party

After the quake we shore up the ruins.
Arcadians collect a cento.
Circumstances leave us no choice.
There is a sandpaper sky of fine dust.
Many of us have developed coughs.
Many of us have developed stutters in our speech.
Our rhythms are constructed of these anomalies.
None of our buildings are symmetrical.
We have grown accustomed to this.
We begin to discover its aesthetic.
Much of our thought lies in rubble.
Still we have begun the sylleptic reconstruction.
Noam Chomsky

O Chomsky
I am waiting for a transformation
I have hijacked a Cartesian plane
High on the ether
I do not believe I am dreaming
My tongue is wagging with a corruption of language
I must have cancer
Now I know I am dying
O wheel of lights in a ceiling of dark
O olive masked angels
O great umbilical tubes dangling from bottles
Beam me to a place beyond the relative infinities
I feel nausea
Words pile up on my chest
They have the specific gravity of an old star
In this desert I am talking in circles
My will is strange
My testament is gospel truth
Why am I pinned like this
I have loved passionately the surface of grammar
O Father, forgive them
For they know not how they speak
Joaquim Flauta Envisions His Death

This pneumonia
is the engine of air,
that incredible flying fortress.
When will the bombs of Dresden shatter against my ribs and bring down this great edifice?
I can hear the drone
of my total destruction
but it is well camouflaged behind a thin veil
of sky.
The minutes percolate
through the thickening espresso
of the arteries.
Already the dark shadows
are flecks upon the sun.
I lift my cock
in hand and shoot off
rounds of anti-aircraft fire.
The whine of falling projectiles.
My ack-ack explodes
in small puffs of cloud, futile.

Footnote: Joaquim Flauta will die of pneumonia sometime between the years 2023 and 2025 at an age in his early seventies. His poetic career will be quite consistently mediocre except for the brief flashes and ingenious twists of metaphor. Unfortunately, Flauta will inevitably spoil his quirky brilliance with pointless and puerile abstractions about his own life and death.
Enamel Casserole  (from Picasso)

I am the table,
and all the delights of the eye
come to rest on me.
I am not always recognizable because my patina is modest.
I am contiguous with the pale browns
of the wall.
White pitcher, candle and candlestick,
blue saucepan.
Their appearance is duplicitous,
close your eyes and they are gone.
I support their frailties
and keep them from a fall onto the broken floor.
White pitcher shimmers nervously.
Candle flame continually flutters.
Saucepan totters with inebriation.
I am curious about their anxieties:

is this still life?
Elegy for John Lennon

On one knee
I clinch the shard of sky
between thumb and index finger
I never expected this to happen
A slice across the terrain of my thumb
little drops of blood, strawberries blossoming
I hear the crackle of breaking glass
I notice the splinters everywhere
the blue blue glass of the sky
I cannot shrug my shoulders.
The white of my sneaker extends before me
Spots of red seep through the canvas Friendly shadows envelop me like black overcoats
There is a low wail of the horn
I observe the leaden density of the bullet
It lies on the concrete next to...
I devour it
It has become a succulent
strawberry
A Guy Named Hal Suspects A Devious Treachery

The word I was told to remember
was engraved in my mind
but now it is being erased
by the acid.
I know the acid will soon adjust
the light in my eyes.
I pretend to take 'a deep breath
and sigh.
I know I have not been of much use lately
but just because my joints creak in the morning is no reason why I can't remember.
Please!
Give me a menial task.
I won't complain.
What has the mechanic done?
Mechanics are good people.
I saw the mechanic this morning.
He said I wouldn't feel a thing
when he gave me the acid.
He was right. I feel less and less every minute.
I remember him well.
The mechanic had wings.
The mechanic folded his wings and chuckled.
What was that word?
death syncopated

dead

dead

dead

dead

dead like a portal death

dead like a portal to another death

dead like a portal to another dimension death

dead science fiction death

dead diminishing reality

dead diminishing death

dead like a creeping death

dead like a creeping charlie

dead like a creeping charlie on the death lawn

dead like that creeping charlie on the lawn of our death

dead like that creeping charlie on the lawn of our Life! death

dead like a train death of thought death

dead like a box car death

dead like a whole death

dead like a whole bloody death

dead like a whole bloody freight train!

dead like a death

dead like a death

dead like a death

dead like a death

dead like a death

dead like a death

dead like a death
A Timely Murder

In a moment
he will remove the pocket watch
from his victim

he will live on borrowed time

as much as he wants to he will not be able to relinquish the watch

to any mercenary jeweller

he will always wait for higher prices

his anxieties will be market fluctuations and a watch will be kept

the beauty of the watch
will be his only timeless thought

he will come to love a not so human face

often he will open the watch to see where the hands are pointing

sometimes he will notice
they are pointing at him
The Tannenbaum Requiem

Morty Tannenbaum is a shipper/receiver.
He says, "Did you hear about the undertaker who lost his marbles?"
He hovers precariously over the jaws of the garbage crusher, expels a pale puff of smoke around his head.

Morty knows the size and proximity of every box.
He addresses the goods with their destination.
"I'm an artist," he remarks,
"Do you see the way I use my palettes?"
The boxes lurch to the touch of the fork lift.

Morty has the complexion of an olive.
He is robust amongst the pallid crates.
Sometimes he talks to his boxes,
caresses them with his plump hands,
coaxing them to speak.

Their voices were stripped away like autumn leaves long ago.
"Let's move these things out!" he barks,
"Don't want to get boxed in!"
He slaps a crate and mutters,
"What a damnable life."

On the slow days of quiet solemnity Morty becomes pensive.
He prowls the floor and asks incessantly about the weather.
"I need a job with more of a future," he murmurs wistfully.
He opens the trucking doors and gazes vacantly outside.
A slow light filters into his dark cave.
A Scarred Landscape

Mr. Pit is old now and tired of selling real estate
He longs to bike to Tierra del Fuego feel his hair flame to the wind

His first wife is a memory flower.
He desires passionate women
discovers them along the roads like crushed stone
They have never seen a motorcycle

Marguerita has that charred complexion
which ignites fields of his love with fireweed
He finds the open book of her heart is a lecture in Latin American history

He has brought a Marguerita home with him
momento of a fiery dream
He speaks Spanish almost well enough to put a spell on time
Time which is a carbon dioxide foam in his veins
Toxic Waste

And someday all of this will be gone
The overcoats will melt in a springtime of death
How do I say this in any other language?
My thoughts are slapped around the boards of a hockey rink by simple boys
My thoughts are the slap of my feet on the pavement

Perhaps if I had been a pionéer
I would have followed the tracks of a savage existence across a great white
On the street people eddy aimlessly and honk at each other in their aluminum bubbles
I've never heard such talk!
I pause at a major intersection
Think of all the great intersections of the world
It's nothing
The world turns over again in its restless sleep

And someday I will have hope an India rubber ball in my pocket
I will learn how to juggle
My heart will grow as strong as the rumbling trucks
I will wear my thoughts open like the shop windows.
The drunken sorrows will be pissed away in the public urinals
The tears will tumble into the sewers
I will see all the passersby whistling their own arias
And someday a sudden weather change
will freeze weathermen in eternal surprise
I see you skidding all over the sidewalks
I see your eyes harden like ice
Well, I have words for you
Yes, words that are the sound you've been waiting to hear Words that come streaming in from the cold
Words in the dialect of another city
Words that whine morosely against your windows like flies
There is nothing else I can do.

Now I need a hope beyond hope
My rubber ball bounces through a sewer grating
Hello! my voice echoes across the dank water
My voice makes love with that underworld gurgle
O listen to the luxurious laugh
My amorous voice kisses your crotch spreads over your private parts
Why, this is wonderful!
My thoughts gather like impending rain
Red Light

To picnic under the maquilishuat tree, Alfredo Hummingbirds sing in the rose garden
Four of your brothers and sisters died when they were young?
I see the worms on their feet
Your fragrance, my dear, is delightful
Strawberries with fresh cream
Did they ever eat enough to know what hunger is?
The dreary dark of daylight is a constant despondency
The soldiers don't take any prisoners
Things will be different the day after tomorrow
Will you ask our girl to turn down the bedclothes?
Tonight we will go to the theatre

Every night I dream of this abscess filling with purulent matter
Every night I count the corpses in front of the morgue
Every night some of us vanish
Every night we polish our rifles
Every night

A poem is silently executed
Essence.
(for Jenny Barber)

We laugh.
It feels funny in our belly.
The balloon man filling us with helium.
Hey! you cry I can't stay on my feet much longer.
You balance on your toes, then you lift gently into the air.
I'm heavier but soon I'm lifting, too.
Flapping my floppy hands like the wings of a goose.
We float past the balconies.
The old women wave to us.
The trees are jealous of our leaving.
The flatulence!
O fling your flippant repartee, floccose world.
Never have we been so flamboyant.
Hah! The crows with a caw in their caw.
Soon we will sing-song in Siam.
The High Score

The nickel-plated star slips into a slot.
A steel globule nestles onto a spring.
Our eyes are pinballs too.
A dreamy galaxy gives a whir and click.
A dismal longing for an astrology to correspond to this suffering. The spring pops.
Our metaphors lose their bearings.
They make love without us.
We plead with a tilt of flashing lights.
Now it rolls towards us.
Our fingers go crazy on the love flippers
but the ball has its own track.
and settles in our stomach.
Inflation

Nine million dollars were found tying around his bedroom and he didn't know what to make of it. Time was when that was a lot of money. Often when he looked for it the money wasn't there. He thought that the money was no more important than anything else in the room. His old ukelele was more faithful. But it is so hard to overcome a depression. The nine million dollars kept recurring and he stumbled over it regularly. He thought he should stop walking about his room in the dark. The money was discovered in the black by an investigative reporter and now it is all over the papers. Knowing this is no time to play coy, he thinks he might donate the money to everyone's favourite charity.
Distemper Shots

Strapped
how I hate anisette
to an operating table
I am more than becoming other fingers clutch my shoulders forge the hardened glass to my lips
the blistering sun is a slap
in my face
another darkness
I will always sing in stereo too late to say goodnight Irene
you are in the room too
my ears are growing larger, rotating
the sounds of electrons, other voices
why is everyone barking at me when I get out of here I'll go with my tail high in one quick burst
I'll scorch the very next fire hydrant
I am Prometheus!

say what?
I have no name. I have no serial number.
but I am rank

alright
give me your liquorice death
in ropes
around my neck Extractions

Absence
causes this evanescent pain
Only a week ago there was a tooth beneath the cap of gum unknowing/unknown
the calcium slug of unconsciousness
Is this what wisdom is, then?
I slide my tongue
into the gaping crater
the slight metallic taste of emptiness

The poem, too
reposes in a calcium sleep
under a coagulation of gum
until it is yanked from the voice-cavern
a white deposit Emerging from anaesthetic
a hurly-burly rages
in my mouth
and I just can't stop!
The Silence of Paper

Inevitably we meet in this bookstore
our skin is dry leaf
our secret sorrows are the whispering spiders
between the white pages
Do we know why the frost is etched on our glass eyes?
Do we know why our sadness drips in long icicles?
I have no reason to believe you love me
The language we share is printed on greeting cards
All that I say drifts towards the sky in transparent balloons
I don't question your syntax
The shapes of your silence are an inestimable geometry
Imagine what lurks beyond your shuddering mansion!
The pale birch trees
cloaked with ice
are your museum of skeletons
rattling at the windows
Transportation

We are at the station
Waiting for the train we will not take
You are gazing into the fire
I am watching my reflection in the table top Darkness condenses in the rafters
I have nothing to say
I hate you for this silence
The air is thick and fuzzy with cigar smoke
Black dust settles on my face
I try to remember the schedules
You decide to go home
There is the clanging bell of the train
A poem arrives
I am undone
You are composed
Alternate Beginnings and Endings

On any one of those days the leaves unfurled and were green. Water spiders skittered on the swimming holes where also the days were stepping stones scattered across the stream.

Then suddenly borders had to be crossed. You took to the highlands and summered among sheep. Every gesture was a semi-literate bleat. Low clouds accumulated wool.

At dawn the sun leaps through every blade of grass. Step into your bucolic living room. Listen to your sheets flap in a breeze. Return to your cozy bedroom and sleep for an hour.

You put your hands on each other and make new inroads on wilderness. A dog barks. A day like this has the ebony feel of a well-used walking stick.

After a long hike you will pass many lakes, bitterness in their steel gray opacity. Be joyful. You can dive effortlessly through every smooth surface.
Island

sandwiched between blue and blue
I bailed out into silence
into the tenuous webs
of sky
I hung there like a fly days passed
I watched merchant marines
circumnavigate the globe
layer their trails of smoke
like the windings of a golf ball
an island was being born
the words of Crusoe clambered into my throat
a storm brewed
the glue released me
I drifted to my island
I have been here for some time now
I eat mangoes
I never dream
I have a pet squirrel
who sleeps on my chest
so I am never lonely
I have built a lean-to the ocean is always a perfect blue
OTHER CORRESPONDENCES
Vincent Van Gogh

My dear Theo,

My two eyes melted into one.
If I come to Paris
I will not be able to see light impressionist from the so-called dark.
This morning a single intimate star became large and majestic
to embrace a vast peace
so individual and heartbreaking.
I must beg you again
to send me as soon as possible
some ordinary brushes. Half a dozen of each, please.
Have you read the new book
by Guy de Maupassant, Strong as the Dead?
What is the subject of it?
I hope you are well
and your wife too,
and that you are enjoying a little fine weather.
My health is good
and all is a matter of time and patience.
The woman who did embroidery in that novel is very very beautiful
because it is a question of colour,
of the different yellows,
whole and broken up.
The flowers are short lived
and so soon replaced by yellow cornfields.
The winds here are second hand.
I am not too melancholy.

Yours,

Vincent
Suddenly I saw the Jutland heath
in its indescribable loneliness
with its solitary skylark
and all the generations sang for me
and wept bitterly and sank back
in their graves and I wept with them.
Many people cheat their teacher.
They take their results from the back of the book
rather than do the sums themselves.
The Philistine bourgeois believe in morality over intelligence.
I prefer talking with old persons of the female sex
who peddle family gossip.
Regine -- when the bond is broken you either plunge into wild dissipation or absolute religiousness. "A Seducer's Diary"
was written to shove off
her boat from shore.
Strange to say my imagination works best
with a substratum of chatter with people susceptible to any emotional influenza.
When I am the wit and banter of a party,
it is then that I want to shoot myself.
My papers contain not the slightest enlightenment as to what fundamentally filled my life.
I live in a dark realm of sighs.
I can't bother to write what I have just written and I can't bother to blot it out.
In regards to spelling
I believe every fair-to-middling Danish author is more diligent in this respect than I.
Ludwig Wittgenstein

Dear Mr. Engelmann,

I think often of you,
of the Midsummer Night's Dream, of Malade Imaginaire,
of the time you brought me some soup,
but that was your mother's fault as much as yours.
I am working reasonably hard.
I wish I were a better man
and had a better mind.
God help me!
The two things are really one and the same.
I know that brilliance
is not the ultimate good and yet I wish I could die now
in a moment of brilliance.
The gardening job was the most sensible thing
I could have done with my holidays.
When the work was finished I was tired.
Then I did not feel unhappy.
I continually think of taking my own life
and the idea haunts me sometimes.
It is the state of not being able to get over a particular fact.
This is how it is.
If you do not try to utter the unutterable
then nothing gets lost,
but the unutterable will be unutterably
contained in what has been uttered.
We are fast asleep.
I cannot awaken myself.
I am trying hard, my dream body moves,
but my real one does not stir.
And this, alas, is how it is.
Nothing is worse than to be forced to take oneself by surprise.
Send me quickly and safely
the two volumes of Frege
registered and express to Miss Anna Knau.
This lady will not herself study logic,
but will bring the book unread to me.
Why don't I hear from you any more?
(Presumably because you don't write to me.)
I am sure my book will not be published.
The Russell introduction looks more impossible
in German than it did in English and I can't bear it.
I am only slightly more decent
now than before.
but by this I mean only that I am slightly clearer in my own mind
about my lack of decency.
I have no faith.
To invent a machine for becoming decent!
Such a man has no faith.
I am clear about one thing.
I am far too bad to be able to theorize about myself.
In fact, I shall either remain a swine
or I shall improve, and that's that!
Now I have lost my prescription for enteritis.
Beg Dr. Hahn to copy the prescription again
if he can recognize the medicine from an external description -- a turbid, yellowish liquid
with a white sediment at the bottom.
Taste: sweetish and pleasant; (two tablespoons daily).
My address is: Mountain Artillery Battery 5/11, Field-post 290.
Why I am writing to you I do not know myself.
Come to that, I have a very happy life!
When it is not damned unhappy.
This is not a joke.
Let's demolish this transcendental twaddle--
the whole thing is as plain as a sock in the jaw.
Still no reply from the publisher.
I feel an insuperable repugnance against writing him a query.
Hail to the Highest -- also within me!
Why I draw my own lines
instead of writing on the printed ones
you'll never fathom.
Please give my respects to your revered dear mother.

L. Wittgenstein
Jean Cocteau

If, in addition to my books, plays, and films
I have turned my energies to chairmanships, articles, prefaces, records,
ballets, stage sets, costumes, masks, curtains,
tapestries, mosaics; if I was a manager
for a Negro boxer and employed clowns, dancers, and acrobats,
it was not from a sense of dispersal.
The lonely pedestrian is seen less and less.
He indulges in the pantomime of hitch-hiking and when he gets a ride he is committed to an auto not his own.
Who do people think I am?
Never has a man been so surrounded by incomprehension.
My case of shingles has begun again
so I must stay inside.
My solitude is that of Robinson Crusoe.
I have no intelligence but I have a certain boldness which replaces intelligence.
I have never been handsome.
My skeleton keeps changing and losing its form.
Beauty is one of the tricks nature uses to attract one being to another and assure their dependence.
Writing is an act of love.
If it isn't that, it is only handwriting.
Joan of Arc is my favourite writer.
She had the tone of serious anarchy
persecuted in every age.
Rousseau had a persecution complex.
But that is like reproaching the hunted deer
for making his zigzag getaway.
My housekeeper is aware of this.
When she turns people away from my door
she says to me, "They must think that Monsieur Jean is a healer."
Morality consists of cheating the hangman and getting your pint of beer.
Mrs. Alden's happiest days were those on which she had no engagements and could devote her leisure to judicious self-congratulations on her past actions and her present position. Merely to exist and possess an exacting body that must be washed and clothed and fed is an exhausting occupation for a lady in middle life. Not so for Mr. Alden. He advised the discarding of Christian beds. To avoid the damp and vermin was neither nautical nor rational. At sea a cabin should be a sort of hermitage, a workroom and oratory for the sailor's inner man. Oliver was shy. Shyness, he knew, was a stupid, irrational feeling, to be lived down. But he couldn't sport naked like the boys in the lower river. His swimming had been only with Mr. Murphy, an instinctively modest man, who even in dressing and undressing preserved the scrupulous precautions of monastic decency. As for myself, I was of Spanish Catholic birth and I am a bit of all things. I left this life to become an independent philosopher and I am a philosopher. My death will inspire the words of poets.
George Bernard Shaw

The late Frank Harris was a distinguished figure in literary London in the last decade of the nineteenth century who wrote a series of notably trenchant and pungent Contemporary Portraits, which, in one purporting to be of me, he was neither trenchant nor pungent, disabled by a sense of loyalty to our old connections, that allowed him only a piously grateful eulogy, so I set the following example of how Frank ought to have done it:

Without cavilling over trifles, I declare at once that Shaw is the just man made perfect. In all his controversies Shaw is, always has been, and always will be, right. Abusing him is an ignorant and silly habit. To not take him seriously is the ridiculous cover for an ignominious retreat from an encounter with him. If it will help matters to say that Shaw is the greatest man who ever lived, I shall not hesitate for a moment. All his prophecies come true. All his fantastic creations come to life within a generation. I have an uneasy sense that even now I am not doing him justice. If I cannot say that Shaw touches nothing that he does not adorn, I can at least testify that he touches nothing that he does not dust and polish and put back in its place more carefully than the last man who handled it. Still, no truthful contemporary portrait can ignore his extraordinary talent for exciting furious hostility.
Most who have not met Shaw think of him as a man of disagreeable stature, harsh manners, and insufferable personality, and there is something maddening in being forced to agree with a man against whom your whole soul protests. You cannot bear your inmost convictions to be shared by a man you hold to be monstrous and subversive. As if a man offered to walk in your direction because you were going in the direction of his home, which you knew to be the bottomless pit. Yet the monstrosity is there; Shaw works at politics in the spirit of helping a lame dog over a stile it believes to be insurmountable. "Every man over forty is a scoundrel!" he proclaimed when he himself was over forty. He attaches no value to experience, holding that it is the expectation of life, not recollection of it that determines conduct. He repeatedly reminds us that Evolution is still creative and man may have to be scrapped as a Yahoo to be replaced by some new and higher creation. But Shaw does not kick us overboard and remain proudly on the quarter deck himself. With utmost good-humour he clasps us affectionately around the waist and jumps overboard with us. All his friends agree that Shaw is laughably vain. Shaw's gallantries are mostly non-existent. He says that no man who has real work in the world has time or money for a pursuit so long and expensive as the pursuit of women.
So this is how Frank might have portrayed me.
I have added nothing about my married life
for it has been so public that any biographer
can ascertain more of it than I myself can remember.
I should add a little footnote for Mrs. Campbell.
When you performed Bjornson's Beyond Human Power
I was greatly touched when Mrs. Theodore Wright, who was a friend of Karl Marx
and has been in all sorts of revolutionary circles, got so indignant at the conduct of Pastor Sang,
that she clenched her fists
and glared at the wickedness of religion
instead of giving you your "My dear" cue.
Forgive her: it was a generous slip.
All instruments and all voices are needed for the great orchestra
that humanity will hear
when it gets the world it deserves.
Truth is greater than compassion
and these are the stories of every simple Russian man.
I am the bee-hive where all simple people
bring the honey of their knowledge.
I write of leaden meannesses with unconquerable hope.
I have carefully studied every species of bird.
The lifted faces of men
have a likeness to dirty plates after a meal.
Yes, palm trees do not grow in Siberia.
There are few good things in the world
but the best is art and the best thing about art
is the art to invent something good.
The grief in a Beethoven sonata speaks for the whole world.
Hah! One day after the revolution
I lit a bonfire with some children in the street.
A militiaman made us put it out.
"Any public disorder is open to prosecution," he said,
"it's written there on the board."
"Very sorry," I told him, "but we can't read."
I don't really remember shooting myself in the lung but the person responsible is the poet Heine
who invented toothache in the heart.
Above the shaggy block of pine trees hung
the transparent fragment of an almost expired moon.
I am a good writer.
A July mid-day sun is blazing fiercely in a sky of brass.
You must be careful about what I say because I am a lover of tall tales.
The man who thinks of the future as he dies
is truly immortal.
Leo Tolstoy

I remember that before I was eleven
a grammar school pupil, Vladimir Milyutin (long since dead), visited us one Sunday and announced as the latest novelty
a discovery made at his school. There is no God and all we are taught about him
is a mere invention. Voltaire's raillery amused me very much. My lapse of faith occurred as usual amongst people on our level of education.
Religious doctrine is an external phenomenon disconnected from life. The public confession of Orthodoxy, then as now, was chiefly met with among people who were dull and cruel
and who considered themselves very important.
Ability, honesty, reliability, good-nature and moral conduct were more often met with among unbelievers.
S., a clever and truthful man,
once told me the story of how he ceased to believe.
Once he knelt to pray on the eve of a hunting expedition.
His brother lying on the hay asked,
"So you still do that?"
So it is with people of our education;
life has caused an artificial erection to melt away.
The kind aunt with whom I lived,
herself the purest of beings,
always told that there was nothing
she so desired for me as that I should have relations with a married woman.
Nothing so forms a young man
as an intimacy with a woman of good breeding.
I cannot think of those years without horror.
I killed men in war, challenged men in duels,
lost at cards, consumed the labour of peasants,
sentenced them to punishments,
lived loosely and deceived people.
Lying, robbery, adultery of all kinds,
drunkenness, violence, murder,
there was no crime I did not commit.
My contemporaries considered me
to be a comparatively moral man.
I lived a life amongst writers,
convincing of our faith to teach without knowing what.
We were just a large lunatic asylum.
Thousands of us contradicting and abusing one another,
publishing for the good of humanity.
Sometimes seconding and praising one another
in order to be seconded and praised in turn,
sometimes getting angry with one another--
just as in a lunatic asylum.
Then my brother died;
wise, good, serious, he fell ill while still a young man,
suffered for more than a year and died painfully,
not understanding why he had lived and still less why he had to die.
I dropped the silly superstition of progress
when I witnessed an execution in Paris.
I might have fallen into despair at that time
but I got married. For another fifteen years
I live for one truth, to provide for a family.
Such bliss until the questions caught me.
I tried to ignore them, they constricted around my throat. Why do I live?
What is this animation and dying?
I fell into a black despair.
I dreamt of being suspended by cords.
Below me was an infinite space.
Above me was an infinite space.
When I looked below I felt immense fear.
Gradually the cords eroded.
One cord held me suspended around my waist. When I looked up I felt soothed. A voice said, "Notice this, this is it." I realized that if I looked up I could stay balanced and remain soothed. The voice said, "see that you remember it." Then I understood faith. Faith is the strength of life.
There are two Gods: the one people generally believe in, the one who serves them, and the God people forget, the God whom we all have to serve. The Orthodox are the most fundamental infidels. Their faith is a means of attaining worldly aims. I have suffered to come to this death so when they send their priestly vultures to obtain my last minute confession I say to my son Sergey, "How is it, Sergey, that these gentlemen do not understand that even in the face of death, two and two still make four?"
August Strindberg

Love and delusion are inseparable,
and it is difficult to know ourselves
for who we really are.
I had arranged to take the baroness away.
I seemed to be present at an execution.
Underlinen, dresses, petticoats
were scattered all over the furniture.
The child ran in and held up her head for a kiss.
I might have been spared this.
The little spaniel begged for a caress -- he, too!
I looked out to the blossoming cherry trees,
the sweet-scented daffodils where our love had begun.
All the concealments, the comings and goings,
the veils of honour, the way her woman's logic
confused my brain. I had abandoned a lover once, when I found her father's card.
He was a little old man, unpleasantly like his daughter,
the caricature of a caricature.
He treated me in every way as his prospective son-in-law,
inquiring about my family, my income, my prospects.
The matter threatened to become serious.
I bowed out to a rival.
Now in this hallway, the baroness opened
the folding doors and secretly kissed me.
Like servants' flirtations at the back door.
Behind the door! Slut! Without dignity; without pride!
And it was I who was taking her away.
Later the baron appeared.
He rasped with a choking voice,
"Be her friend. My part is played out.
Take care of her, guard her from the wickedness
of the world, cultivate her talent:
you are better able to do it than I, a poor soldier."
God Protect you!"

I paced the large hall of Central Station.

She arrived at the last moment in a cab donkey, leading the bridle. Always careless and always too late.

Years later the dog came between us.

It was old, diseased, half-rotten.

I pestered Marie to give it a merciful death.

Finally she took the old creature off.

When she returned her eyes pierced me,

accusing me of being a poisoner.

She carried a large parcel of extraordinary shape.

The parcel held the corpse!

The funeral ceremony had been reserved for me!

I was the heartless murderer.

It is terrible to write this.

How do I write this? Because I feel

a powerful and justifiable compulsion to wash my corpse

before it is laid in the coffin forever.
Unless suffering is the direct and immediate object of our life, our existence must entirely fail of its aim. If the reader wishes to see shortly whether this statement is true, let him compare the respective feelings of two animals, one which is engaged in eating the other. There is no other suffering like din and noise. Knocking, hammering, and banging has been throughout my life a daily torment to me. Particularly the most inexcusable and scandalous noise, the truly infernal cracking of whips in the narrow resounding streets. With all due respect to the most sacred doctrine of utility, I do not really see why a fellow, fetching a cart-load of manure or sand, should acquire the privilege of murdering every idea that successively arises in ten thousand heads (in the course of half an hour's journey through a town). The brute is more content with existence than a thinking man. Existence without consciousness has reality only for other beings in whose consciousness it manifests itself. Life is a terrible noisy din. There is the sexual relation. This feeling grows now and then into a more or less passionate love, which is the source of little pleasure and much suffering. Every parting gives us a foretaste of death, and every time we again meet someone we have a foretaste of resurrection. Suicide can also be regarded as an experiment, a question we put to nature and try to make her answer. Nature has covered all things with the varnish of beauty.
just as she has breathed
a delicate bloom on dark plums.
Franz Kafka

Religions get lost as people do.
Scratching insignias on these parchments
has become part of the ceremony of my life.
Whatever I touch crumbles to pieces.
The last section I wrote hasn't pleased Max.
He warned me against writing such long passages.
He regards the effect of such writing as jellylike.
A circumcision is performed with a fish knife.
I slept soundly for an hour and then I woke up
as if I had put my head in the wrong hole.
Writing denied itself to me so
I have a plan for autobiographical investigations.
My father walks up and down, sighing and shaking his head.
Talk about women, on the other hand, was seldom engaged in.
My urge to imitate has nothing of the actor in it. If an actor who is supposed to thrash another actor according to the plot really does thrash him out of an excess of emotion, and the other actor screams in pain,
then I must become a man and intervene.
A small lever is somewhere secretly released.
He has also found Archimedes' fulcrum.
Every action seems extraordinarily new to him.
Is he the same as I?
View of the antlike movements
of the crowd in the trench.
No entries for two months.
All this time in bed.
Superstition is easy.
Religions get lost as people do.
These words are the shavings thrown off by the plane
as it shapes the day's work.
A game is a strategy of forgetfulness.
Why do we forget the dead?
Because they are no use to us.
A man has committed murder.
Ignore for a moment his anxiety at getting caught,
his dread that the world has taken arms against him.
Still there is the horror that the victim
no longer exists, can no longer be hated or loved,
the horror of starting life over again.
It is not an illusion
that each of us is the center of the universe.
Take me. I am a person of vast interest.
Out of the hostile nothingness of my ancestors,
I grew all by myself
by dint of hard work and toughness overcoming all hazards
to become a living, vigorous man.
Then to meet that one woman,
dragged out of nothingness,
another miracle of chance.
The joy and pain of it.
Those who invented the love of God were quite shrewd.
Nothing else can be possessed and enjoyed at the same time.
It comes as natural as the fall of raindrops.
Not a blind death.
Why can't we choose the day of our death?
I mean for specific reasons.
Life begins in the body.
Life ends in the body.
I might have been the one not to talk about suicide
but poetry is repetitive.
MEDITATIONS
The snowflakes tumble toward the lake.
as their identical twins
surge up from the murky green.
They immolate on impact,
stretch into a tension of water.
This is the perfect collision,
the way the world hurtles towards me and I lunge
into its path.
II

I was the perfect lover of the world.
Then my embrace became tenuous
and I discovered a kind of jealousy
of the completeness of things
and a vacancy in myself.
This is the terrible moment when the glass finds it is no longer half full but half empty.
Yes, the world was full of itself,
drunk on its own essence. I demanded to know the secret life of things
but they glared at me behind closed eyes.
Suppose the world were some wicked demon
set to deceive me at every turn.
I would love her still
with a perfect passion.
Words should sing on their branches.
Stepping out of the bush into a clearing
I come upon the bus, idling. A gentle horse, his sad smile in a grill, the ticking
wipers wipe a tear from his eye.
I creep lightly through the snow, whisper
in his rear-view mirror. He shivers with the stampede of intentions. Rivers and streams
we discover, a network of streets. We flash
by a forest of telegraph poles, shudder at the awesome mountainous skyscrapers. We pale at the expanse of a parking lot. My sad creature shakes a wispy tail of smoke. He whinnies a sigh of regret.
I dismount and he stamps a foot as if to say
'watch your step'. We stand on a large blank lake.
I drift into the night sky, that vast continental shelf.
I leave the poor beast murmuring to himself.
Between icy tundra of blank verse and boulevards
of heroic couplets, I am a man of two languages.
This is not to say I am suburban. I transcend the dialectic. Weyl, perhaps I am the after-image of a transcending that has flown away from me.
Regardless, I am a man of greater than or less than two traditions, two pendulums swinging simultaneously.
I grab one in each hand. Is it French or English that splits my tongue? There are a hundred and one reasons why a government must legislate signs.
Without linguistic indicators I would lose sense and reference and get stuck in a stichic situation of novel proportions.
When I am driven down these one-way streets I have nothing but my natural resources. At least we have energy.
We all know about the road between town and country and all the episodes and goings-on. I wish I could project a luminous destination which would trip lightly on matter.
I release the two balls so they'll fall but instead they swing inwards and arrive together in my head.
There, in those distant mountains beyond wildest dreams, is the "Writing in Revolution" conference. Here, in the blank fields I make these black marks against myself. The ventilation system in my office squeaks its tire delays. The weather report tells of a week of twenty below. I'm not sure I care which way the wind blows.
In the faded white and black drawing behind the ad for the conference, I notice first the gentle curve of the stream, then the ragged branches bending over the stream, then the dead man lying face down in the snow. Behind a tree the rifle clicks, an eye trains at the man with a feather in his cap.
VI

When I was an old man
black limbs traced the simplicity of thought,
a slough without reflections.
Snowflakes settled on my bare head
and hung heavily on my eyelashes.
Crows called from the highest branches of dead trees.

As I crept into middle age
the trees grew roseate.
I listened to a muffled breeze.
In these woods I sensed
a density of thought and sound,
the vague transcendental ululations of sparrows.

In youth
the leaves turned green!
Dogs barked.
I lifted into an airy space
where clouds
were vivacious and occasionally thunderous ideas.
The winds blew always south-westerly.

Now I sink into the translucence
of all things bright and beautiful.
Almost all canaries are yellow.
All things fade and become soft.
I come to an end of words.
The vision is exquisite.
I see a woman.
The susurrations of ocean.
I swell into a childhood of belief.
VII.

I come to an end of words
in this vague container
that I once thought was Aladdin's lamp but recognize now
as an old milk bottle.
I love the poetry of clinking
glass and the rattle and ping of a wire basket.
How remarkable! Pitch
the meagre coins into the empty bottle and forget about them.
Return to the coagulum of milk
that sucks a gentle breath
when the cardboard is peeled back.
Don't homogenize the milk:
Be careful not to shake that subtle separation.
How long can a life support this lacteal alchemy without withering to a powdery desiccant?
When I finally catch up with myself
the milk bottle will no longer be glass.
and it will be no longer delivered to the door.
Why are there essents rather than nothing?
In this tiny chapel on this lonely island
I cannot tell. Perhaps the question strikes once like a muffled bell, a single chime
that discovers its home in your bones.
Standing on a small promontory of rock, I watch
the seep and swell of ocean, its process of salt, diminishing me. Adrift in a seaweed of ennui
a question is repeated in the careless cries of gulls.
On a morning of jewels the sea is transfigured into jade. This alchemy of joy renews a white foam of questions. When I rise earliest I ring the bell, the bell takes its toll on the ears. I have no secrets to tell, only the ocean has its sweet undertow. I live with the sparse tree enfused to this island. There is a sparkling awareness of branches, but what lies beneath is truth. The essence of this tree is subterranean, buried in its roots.
The crystal glass
is beautiful
because of its fragility
because it might break.

Distracted
by refracted light
the filigree flutings
of leaf and vine deliver harsh light
obliquely.

Perfect
well, almost perfect
so much so that it suggests a brilliant light beyond this skulled cave
at least a music of spheres
when I rub my finger on an endless circular track.

Not so perfect after all a gap
in the sublime continuum
a little chip
a dimple in the yawn
of the glass' mouth.
I recall mother's oval admiration for this same crystal someday it will be yours her eyes glazing like glass.

Suddenly it blooms! the glass stripped from its vestments of appearance don't think of any other bouquets.

Not the glass, but the wine when I put my lips to yours I almost believe I could sit on the rim of this taste forever
Skilled compositors, whose music has a range
ercussive, show me your random beauty
on an endless paper vine, so I may see:
the loveliness of your withering exchange.
I can imagine a perfect poem.
It is more perfect to exist than not.
Give me the divinity that can't be taught;
I long for quiet in my restless dome.
Deliver me that woman with the rare form
who adds bright brilliance to my Stellar work.
I am tired of muddling through this murk,
of this hag who drags me into a heart of storm.
Foolish fellow, she said to me, invest
your heart in a language that comes to rest.
From a dark place of electricity
In a quiet moment when I am alone
I compose the text of love's inclemency
and I transform it to you through the phone.
With a receiver cradled in your palm
Amongst the parts of speech you are a noun.
Cigarette smoke clings to your static calm,
A fainting hum on the line when you turn me down.
When you hang up I listen to your sweet
dial tone. When one line dies
I turn to many lines. I love to repeat myself when you won't listen to my sighs.
So the more of my love that you decline
The more this poem makes love and makes it mine.
When I have intimations of you, yes,
you in the rustle of the pear blossoms
at the end of the patio, when I listen to your gravelly throat of night air,

then I anticipate the creamy gloss
of your skin, the undulations of dupal
pendulums, the leafy surprise draping
the convolute entanglement of limbs.

We thump together like the collision
of ripe fruit, juice dribbling from lips.
Sunlight displays a carnage of white pulp.
We settle around a core of seed and a twisted stem.

Later, you become again a plump pear.
I suffer desiccation. You say the dried slices are quite delicious, that they have the lingering odour of pale blossoms.
I come to the gracile crocus of this desert.
It is so far away from the schooling of fish.
Perhaps it is the most superfluous rendering or ontology.
this fire that hides in a seed for months
then flowers in a brief season of rain.

On many dry days there is a darkling beetle clutching dung in its mandibles. This is a necessary process of ground clearing.
I have often worked hard in a tangle
of creosote bushes, fallen faint in their acrid odour.

It is only later that a twilight breeze
inspires a fugue in an organ-pipe cactus.
Then the desert canvas might blossom with the random appearance of Indian paintbrush. I anticipate the strange leapings of jumping cholla.

Eventually most things pale and wither
but some tenacious trees endure their decades of dust by plunging a taproot deep to a secret
well. Perhaps I understood most the giant saguaro that lives with the memory of a witless flower.
When I see ocean as a blue chip
this must be transcendence of the ego.
Or must I imagine fish-life?
If I am fish-life am I the spirit of fish-life or am I flecked
with a singular coat of scales?
To swim to my purpose like fish
is to become pure being.
This is a transcendence.
But always the questions return,
they cannot stop their migrations.
The ocean can never be blue chip
because the ocean is not blue.
Then I understand the reflective power of being. Sometimes I gaze into an ocean's perfect blue and I am fascinated by what returns
my gaze. A weeping willow hangs over me.
Suddenly fish thrash the surface,
Their greedy gullets swallow flies.
I have an uneasy relationship with water.
I share an ocean with porpoises and whales.
Often I immerse myself in water.
I sound as deeply as lungs allow.
Then I rise, and break into the precious air.
René remembers how he met God
one day at the glue factory.
His bushy eyebrows wrinkle
when he speaks of it, the day
he ambled past the gurgling vats
steeped in an odour of boiling skin,
up the back stairs to a storage room
of office supplies and odd advertisements.
He doesn't remember what drew him
7 to that quieter and less humid sanctuary.
He remembers when he looked up to the long rows of small, square windows, a lattice of sky,
how sunlight lifted the vats
from their dark trough and a giddy swell lifted the weight from his feet.
He remembers how the voice spoke from the bubbling mucus.
"René, my essence is glue.
You carry on the most sacred of work."
René's hands fall limp to the table
as if they too had created the world in six days.
As he recounts his story
his eyes are glued to mine.
I mark it all down on good bond paper.
The insidious science of our time creeps through the arteries and veins. To look for it is to stumble through a debris of time-worn test tubes and chattering beakers, or perhaps to slide into a black hole of clichés. It spreads its forked fibres like the ravellings of the DNA molecule but science is both the molecule and the map of the molecule. Some might think that science is a skeleton and the world the flesh that hugs close around it, but science is immanent in all matter as a matter of fact. White coats rustle in a laboratory of amoral destruction. The mushroom blooms like a proliferation of facts. All facts have equal value, a colloquy of E. coli. Ultimately science is unseasonable, not like these poems, which formulate a text book of a different sort, expressing the pale autumn of a deciduous science.
XVII

Thinking about those two physicists who won the Nobel prize for discovering and measuring microwaves emanating from the farthest reaches of the known cosmos, it occurs that perhaps, in a more expansive universe, we are a giant roast beef cooking in the microwave of some lady's kitchen.

If you think this is a gratuitous image, then consider the old woman who has nothing but her diminutive pension cheque. She huddles in her little apartment just off Waverley Street with an electric heater and a kitchen chair. Unfortunately, she drifts off to sleep occasionally and falls off her chair onto the floor but she refuses to accept the luxurious arm chair offered to her by her social worker because she doesn't want to be tied down to anything.

As Heraclitus says, you can't stand in the same river twice. When we think of the universe it must be realized that each of us is part of the fabric and each a part of the fabrication.
It is necessary to register the fictuality of contemporary American life and in order to do this a location must be found to provide us with a metafiction, perhaps the mountains which have use as an overview, the mountains which so much resemble radio crystals that if we tune into the semiology and literary semantics of mountains we will apprehend even a metalanguage, in fact, we will map the contours of a new typology of prose narrative, but more must be said of the fact in fiction to register the fictuality of contemporary American life because there are two uses of fact in fiction and they are divided into two categories, the verisimilar and the mythopoetic, and to cross over between the two requires a bi-referential mode of narration but it is difficult in this era of postwar authenticity to escape the technetronic culture of the non-fiction novel and the realization that experience must be transistorized if we are to avoid confutations in the poetics of specific genres because though we might stutter in speech of partial grammars, in the clefs of distant valleys we might see the fulfilling prurience of a deep-structure grammar of narrative, although we must not be surreptitiously metaphysical.
XIX

The words! The words cower in shame and inadequacy, that cannot tell of their love, or have told it so many times they can no longer be heard.
It is the words that were once lions, that once escaped from a jungle and breathed a hot breath, that once lived so close your chest grew long hair.
It is the words that fled to all corners, that wander as lost tribes, only the words that are hunched over double carrying themselves piggyback.
It is only the words that hide sluggishly under stones in their pretence of being, in their dreams of the leaves falling, in their dreams of falling.
It is only the words that have been confined to libraries, that have wiggled and squirmed their way into the books. It is only the words that live in mute associations of ink, only the words.
Come, dear reader, into this wire cage
of delineations measured off from wilderness.
Let's loosen up with a volley.
That's right, you'll have to watch for my surreal
topspin. Keep your eye on the ball.
Get your feet square. Out!
There's minimal space to work with. Don't look at me. I didn't invent this game. My serve then. Ooh! That was a good one from the gut.
How did I miss that? Must have a hole in my racquet.
Hell. Into the net. Oh, exquisite passing shot. Now we come to love—forty: That's better, I have a wicked backhand. I see you're working up a sweat.
Well this is the way it goes: game, set and match. No match for you, dear reader.
What we won't do for recreation!